Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to engage them) and that, whilst he himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had beene at the same time engaged, he had prevailed: But the second squadron, beinge five, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed and Amilcar, beinge oppressed and scattered, the Consull had good leisure to relieue both the third and the fourth squadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the first, among other his Precepts to Philip the second, his sonne, where he aduiseeth him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battles betweene them and the Christians, he should neuer faile to charge the Lansiers in the beginning of the fight, and to engage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Lansiers, who are alwaies reserved intire in the Rere of the bataille, and in whom the Turkes repose their greatest confidence, come vp in a grosse body, when all the troops on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reformation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triary in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and victorious aduantage it hath ever beene found, to keepe some one or two good troopes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevail in Affric. Atilius the Consull proponeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Now the Romans according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-viualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclia in Sicill, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fiftie English mile frome. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yielded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inuasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage, fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all forts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waite all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Consulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consull is sent home to Rome, whither he carried with him twentie thousand African Captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fiftene thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places that were vnwalld, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came to Adu. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, beinge driuen to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adu he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bassar, together with Amilcar, who had brought out of Sicill fise thousand foote, and fise hundred horse to succour his Countie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were careful to hold themselves free, from necessitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adu out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adu; they incampe neere vnto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they lost the seruice, both of their Elephants, & of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus did not make vse of. He assailes them in their strength, whilst they defend in waile, but in fine the Romans prevail, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the field, they proceeded to Tunis a Citie withstanding the mikes of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this bataille at Adu, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Nomilians, their next Neighbours towards the West, assault vpon their misfortunes, inuade, and spoile their Territory; and force those that inhabit abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens; Amilcar findes his own aduantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out, if he feared lest it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office; that was fiftie expens should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the fruit of obtaining it. Ambition therefore hath no respect but to it selfe, perswading him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them to vnderstand such conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, be desired to be courageous and disdainfull, that they refused, either to defend their liberty, or the life of the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troope of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, & of the overthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neere vnto Adu, sent him word, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ran, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; giues the Romans his opinion; and in conclusion, beinge made Generall of the African forces, he put himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more than twentie thousand foot, and fower thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had; Liberties; Lives; Goods; Wiues, and Children (which might well make it suspected, that the Armenies by Sabaoth spoken of, were misl-humbled; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonly found that they which vse the seruice of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne doores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and raising his troops vpon saire and leuell ground, staid both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battailie. The Romans wondered much, whence this new coming of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soone be checked. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Vilites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forelorne hope; that might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive backe the beasts vpon themselves, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailles deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to doe. By which means, as they were the lesse subiect vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they to much the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemy did faire exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a notable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians were in the wings. The first onset was giuen by the Elephants, against the Vilites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battailie following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Romans battailie was helpful. For when the beasts had spent their force, in pushing through the first rankes, the squadrons neere the lesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing in the first encounter by reason of their aduantage in number, driuen those of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battailions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who beinge forced to come to any way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire; but had very much to doe, to keepe the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans as had escaped the rage of the Elephants, and dete chieftly their backs,

This Citie was taken from the Turks by Charles the fifth in the year 1535. and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge to his sonne to keepe safe; to wit, this Key of Africa; the Key of the Indies; and the Key of Spain. But two of these he kept to lose, that he neuer found them againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to write out of his hands; we were not to picke any lock, but brake open the doore and hauing rifled all, threw it into the fire.

fell upon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal termes. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romans easily recoyling to the body of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with trauell, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these troops, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Roman Armie, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Attilius the Consull. Of their own they lost no more; than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slain, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Spaniards; that wheeling about to a quid the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent fouery they had bin in their propoition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse than this of Attilius; all of them confirming that sentence of Enyrides, Mens vna sapient, plurimum vniui manus; Many hands equal not one wise minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xanthippus returned into Greece, whether for that he was more enuid than honoured, or for what other cause is unknowne.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranfome of prisoners on both sides; giving his faith to returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw, that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his own miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Africke left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with a horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue indured him an obstinate and malicious enemy; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to preferre himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all vvarres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word gaue, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in this case, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine glorious swayward will, rather than from any necessitie of State. For the exchange was made (as we saw) after his death; where in the Romans had the worse bargain, by loosing as Regulus himselfe was yoroth. As for the authority of all Historians, that ascribe him in this point; we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire. Attilius the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grieuous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse the sentence herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans desired to haue no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to put others in like case. Cruelty doth not become more varrantable, but rather more odious, by being odumary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead the Captaines of their enemies whom they took; yea although they were such as had of others made faire war with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolencie in others, as if it were new law only to themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius; the tolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, wherinto the Carthaginians were changed by more desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolencie, and then prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all things are possible.

was desired. In such cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to add vnto onely more tediousnes, approving the true rules, from which our passions carrie vs away. In the year 1378. the Carthaginians won so fast vpon the Africans, that they not onely drave their Gallies out of the Sea; but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Rome itselfe. This bold such an amazement in the Christians of Africa, that they offered vnto the Carthaginians (their State restored) whatsoever they would demand. But Scipio Nicola blowe vpon with many former victories, would haue no composition; save the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Carthaginians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assailed Doris with such desperate furie, that they brake his fleet, kill Doris himselfe, take nineteen of his Gallies, four score boates of Galleyes, and four thousand prisoners; recouered Blacke, & all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genna, enforcing the Gennaues safely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disadvantage being beate; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flinders; in the year 1589, when having taken a notable, and withall an our-crueell reuenge vpon the Gennies; he offered mercy to the rest, who in all humillie, submitting themselves to his obedience, desired their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had refused, and was resolved to taking vnto them wterly; they issue out vpon his Citie with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, brake his Armie, enter Bruges (post-mid) with his vanquished followers, and enforced him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of straw in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saved himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against Attilius: How the Romans being left their fleet by tempest, resolved to forsake the Sea: The great advantages of a good warre, betwixt Nations divided by the Sea.

By the reputation of this late victory, all places that had bin lost in Africke, returning to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit down, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Attilius with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was ready to make ready a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Aemilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consulls. At the hearing of Mercurius, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an hundred and foureteen of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their own men that had bin belicied, and thus they made amaine toward Sicily, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians had therein. In this hasty voyage they despite the aduice of the Pilots, who pray them to tarry in the harbour in time, for that the season threatened some violent stormes, which might be feared between the rising of Orion, and of the Dog Starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and counselled them withall, that the South coast of Sicily had no good Ports, yet therein to land, they fell vpon such an accident; yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the Sea would be more mercifull to them, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to tarry within some Port, as they were advised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much halpiner to be in the Sea, than to be in the hands of the Carthaginians. To take a short worthie description, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet, to take a short worthie description of the storme, that the Romans suffered in the night, while they were in the Sea. The mercifull winds in the night while they were in the Sea, did blow vnto Cambray, and turned, and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but fouretyne of their fleet. The storme was such, that the Romans were driven to the North-west, and therefor they did not tarry in those parts, but did tarry in the end, where the Carthaginians were waiting for them. In the Water quarter contrary to the Carthaginians behaue in the Sea, and the Romans were driven to the North-east, and therefor they did not tarry in those parts, but did tarry in the end, where the Carthaginians were waiting for them. of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory was detoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had happened, repaired all their warlike Vessels, hoping once again to command the Seas: they are also confident of their land-forces since the overthrow of Asilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicily with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and forty Elephants imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arrives at Lilybaeum; where he begins to vex the Partizans of Rome. But ad- versitie doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three months (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ships; with which, and the remainder of their late ship- wracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicily, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison there, in returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africa: to which purpose they im- ploied C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their get- ings. Soon in their returne, they were first set vpon the Lands, and like to have perished, nere vnto the lesser Syrie, where they were faine to heape all over-board, that so they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybaeum, in their pa- sage from Panormus towards Italy, they lost an hundred and fifty of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement next Nation had; the god of the vvas favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enriched them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost besides what they lost in fight, four hundred and five Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to giue over their Navi- gation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sicily, vnder L. Cassius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in some three score ordinary passage boats, by the streights of Messana, that are not about a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Asilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholerick against the Carthaginians, than before, so that for two years after, they kept the high & wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Sea was not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicily, without a Naue, much lesse to maintaine the vvar in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egessa, to Lilybaeum, and to other places in the chiefe West parts of Sicily, making sometimes a march of about an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than foure teene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and forty houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, between Cannus, and Edmond Ironside. For Cannus, when he had entered the Thames with his Naue and Armie, and could not persuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued, and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmond & his Army thither. There finding all entertainment, he againe shippe his men, & entered the Seacoe, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he failed back againe to London: by the means whereof he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased; & yet succoured his Army. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the de- fence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Army from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition & Artillerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue been able to doo it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, how illing, one of the greatest Capitaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceeding Ages haue brought forth, in the year 1590, carried his Armie by Sea, with forty Canons, to Brada: making countenance either to besiege Pejiscade, or Gerpenden Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and vnto all. But as soon as the wind serued, he suddenly set sail, arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned vpon the Rhine, and thence to Ussel, and far downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could double their quer, had found about Holland, about fore score mile, and ouer many great Rakes with their Cannon and cartiage; Spaniards was taken. Again, when the Spanish Armie had over come the wearisome marche, and was now far from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vpon the Rhine, changed his course in the night, and sailing downe the streame, he was set down before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he alio took, ere the Spanish Armie could returne. Lastly, the spanish armie was not sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and expected himselfe before Nymegen in Gelder, a Citie of notable importances;

and in that it is impossible for any maritime Countrey, not having the coasts so well fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerful enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof had rather, than Spain, than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris, in the year 1589, from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lisbon; and that he would haue kept off the English, by power of his land-forces, as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armada, by the blow of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not bin hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleven thousand. But where should this Armie haue bin bestowed? If about Lysborne, then would it haue becne easie vnto the English, to take, ranke, and burne the Towne of Graine, and to waste the Countrey round about it. For the great and threatening preparations of the Earle of Almonde, the Marquess of Serailles, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this: Neither did the hastie leaue of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of An- dras, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his As- sistant: considering, that the English charged these, at Pucette de Burges, and passing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricaded at the further end, routed them, took their campe, took their Generals standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countrey, which they fired. If a royal Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of private aduenturers, had thus begun the war in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portu- gale, and make haste to the defence of their S. Iago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his maine was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, vnto his Kingdom, whither com- ming strong, he expected to be readly and ioyfully welcomed: could they haue hindered his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Peniche, and march ouer the Countrey to Lisborne, fixe dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the Riuer of Lysborne to Cascais, and there, hauing won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe, what another Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, whether an invading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of Eng- land, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it, is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cassars Commentaries, that main- taines the affirmative. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surly I hold with him, that it is the best way to keep our enemy from treading vpon our ground; wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him will, that he had staied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particu- lar circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question, ge- nerall, and positiue, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able, to deterre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to do: and therefore, I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduerture. For the discouragement of a fust victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most cri- tious consequence.

his true, that the Marshall Mentur, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guiana, they of the Protestants Protestant religion, after the battaile of Monsieur, entered that Countie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence, forist the Kinge saith he.) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, je ne bien garde a Monsieur & Admiral, de faire boire les Chanoines la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Languey, on the contrary side, preferred the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerse consideration to be had, betweene such a Countie as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Ramparts are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countie: except euery Creek, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerfull Army, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Ken is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and six thousand at Foulston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sterns, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulston be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foulston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to dis-imbarke his Armie, so that he shall find it vnsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his own game; and (having liberty to go which way he list) vnder covert of the night, set saile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may be said of Waymouth, Porbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily outrun the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armes ne valent point en poste; Armes ne s'eyent, nor run post, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not be able to march it in five dayes. Again, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length sit down in the mid-way, and leaue all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbury in the year 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Portugal should haue landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Islands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euery where hard of access; hauing no good harbour whereto shelter a Naue of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur de Chastes, that held it to the life of Don Antonio, with five or six thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquisse de Saint A Cruz, from setting foote on ground therein; the Marquisse having shewed himselfe in the Road of Angra, did set saile ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port of Mol, farre distant from thence, where he w^as a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chastes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Sirey, slaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chastes, and his followers, what they might expect at the Marquisse's hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port of Mol. Whether our English would be persuaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Africa; wherof the griue men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves precluded by the more nimble ships of Spain.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindered, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fajal, in the yeare 1597, is alledged against this: which example thoues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fajal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, of so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to undertake it: and I harkened vnto them; somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me, to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to inuade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place; yea even there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me, but without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Islanders should not think any aduantage great enough against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth; and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Captaines, and others, not of mine own squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would haue bin short, when I had landed in some other place) that for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne tide. Therefore Iooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Stan, Sir Thom is Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Tannes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Lawrence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprize I vnderooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffs, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or six Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whercon their Musketers lay on the Rest for vs, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done in this example: but the reasons before alledged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more private, than to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauery, and take the shorter course, hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought thought equal to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; he that befield this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthor Gorges was shot in that march; and that such as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driven by him; to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to an halfe trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Maiesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beeste in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maiesty, after God, will employ his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastery of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybaum. How a Rhodian Gallie entered Lilybaum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grieuous losses receiued, vnder Claudius and Iunius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

WHen, without a strong Naue, the Romans found it altogether impossible either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolved once againe, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of war. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, & the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge together with certaine Legions of Souldiers to the new Consuls, C. Attilius, & L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they receiued by Xanthippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had bin in the beginning of the warre: and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybaum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consul was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approaches somewhat neere the Towne, Cæcilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattle a Legion of his Souldiers. To thefe he gaue order that they should aduance themselves, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, & by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this aduantage, fallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted foureteen yeares. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolved to attempt Lilybaum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all indeede, saue Drepanum, that was neere adioyning. They set down before it, and possesse themselves of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the haue, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of defence; & by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, hee repairs with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexan, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agriumentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexan, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Hannibal to appeale the troups of the Gauls, which did waiver, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vnderstaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good wherby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal, the son of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entered the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, & either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the merriest, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans bring more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold fill their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybaum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruise, and hauing receiued his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Agula, a little land neere Lilybaum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shoores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the court of the dafke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of sterage, & himselfe expert in all parts of the channel) recovered the Hauens mouth and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being compassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauens, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprife, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable; and much wondered at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre off, the aduantage which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of war will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no, though fortie peeeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to seare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke & Sweden were at War; our East and West fleet, bound for Leifland, as forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, & he threatened to sink their ships if they came through the straits of Ellenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduantage, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, & to sink them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by Mr. Iam Barrow, leading the way, did not onely passe out with little losse, but did beate downe, with Artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Ellenour; which at that tyme was not so well fortified, as now perhaps it is; and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Puma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Canon on the bancke of the Riuer; so well to purpose, and so neere, with the face of the water, that hee thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown vp by any winde of glory, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme dear in Antwerp, passed his boats between or welle Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it; when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood fauoured them; as also with a contrary winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the River, to his maruailous trouble and charge.

The Port Saint Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when he entered the Port of Calis, neither did the Port at Pantal, when we were entered, beate vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaide vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanche, from five in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be giuen for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Port is so fast, as that of Angra in Terceira, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are drin to rume vpon a bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and fearefull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: Hee arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the state of Lilybæum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grow dedd so many of those great belied boates in the best of the entrance; as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Island, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chafe, and gathered vpon him; hee findes what shee is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her. But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilybæum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vndertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despair and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to strake the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Consull. Hee arrives at Messana, and marcheth our land to Lilybæum: where having re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surpris of Drepanum, a Citie on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This seruice the Capitaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarks his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouvernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre; who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, hee perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be enclosed. Herewithall hee promisseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head, of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, deceived of his expectation, calls backe the foremoost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some rowe backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his aduantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein lie rangeth himselfe, hauing the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But hee waithereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightened, as he could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this seruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme three-score Gallies, with which they send away Lucimius, their Consull, to take charge of their businesse in Sicill. Lucimius arrives at Messana, where he meetes with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twenty Gallies hee had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great fleet hee arrives at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of saile, to keepe company with him along from Messana. In the meane time, he dispatcheth away towards Lilybæum, his Quaestors or Treasurers, to whom he commits the one halfe of his victualers, with some Gallies for their conveyance.

Adherbal was not carelesse, after his late victory: but studied how to vse it to the best aduantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirtie to Carthage, who had three-score and tenne more vnder his owne charge; and sent him to try, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where hee findes the Romans, more attentue to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilio, Gouvernour of the Town, is not behinde hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distress, giues Carthalo good leasure to goe through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicill, deuising how to worke mischief to the enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neere at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victuallers, which the Consull Lucimius, more hastily than proudly, had sent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their coming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, hee hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder covert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to save them onely from the present danger, by lending them engines & other aide, where-with to beate off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride vnder those rocks, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to face their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilst he was busied in this care, the Consull Lucimius drew neere, and was discovered. Anging him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Consull had neither meane to flee, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great, as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian, seeing this, betakes himselfe to a Station betwene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicill, betwene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybæum, a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde so blowed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling bellow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Sowerly storme) hastned to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauegate, and neuer found any soule weather in the entrailes of their beasts, their South-wind being all land and prophets, were suddenly ouer-taken with a boistrous South winde, and all the Gallies forced against the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the seruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Island; against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldom or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an invincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue bene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more than one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding; the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not bene disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enioy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not so be found.

S. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who slowly holds warre with them six yeeres. The Romans having emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of Lucius, the Confull, whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betwene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybæum, and seek to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Confull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprises to vndertake. In the end hee resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betwene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and Armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italic, did thoroughly repay the spoyle which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrians, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicily; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infect the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betwene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not onely very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italic with his fleet, waisting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicily he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he vndertooke a strange peece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Seaside, by which hee conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the midst of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Liue, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land forces, which they held resistlesse, Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquired himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of six yeeres warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was iudged equall, if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had bene deuised and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once bee gotten; it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, ioyned with some others, and laying their money together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their paterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodians, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucilius Calpurnius, who past with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, in dauncouring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertised, that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late losses which his Predecessours had receiued; he was carefull to put himselfe in order, against their arriuall.

Hannus was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of seeming teuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, or things vndertaken by men more worthy than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by euery losse receiued. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grieuous oppressors of their subiect Provinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. He had ere this bene employed against the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Routers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitiue Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an vnworthy Capitaine, he betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferre the League betwene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserued of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall he was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein hee reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which hee thrust forth commended.

Hannus had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither beene carefull in traying his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans giue way: forgetting, that rather the resolute force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceiued aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to saile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and hauing thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make his enemye repent of his new aduerture to Sea. This was a good course, if it could haue beene performed. But Catulus vsed all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, & for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was discried, yet he rather chose to fight with the enemy, that had the winde of him, than to suffer his conuoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should haue done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all vnecessary burthens; and he had taken aboard the choyce men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated, hauing fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and sunke, 20 and seuentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieronensis.

The state of Carthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whercon to resolute. Meanes to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left, their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, vpon whose valour, and iudgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicill, where hee could not bee relieved. In this extremitie, they make dispatch vnto Amilcar himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should seeme best vnto his excellent wisdom; leauing all conclusions to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recovery, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) resolved to make tryall, whether his necessitie might bee compounded vpon any reasonable termes. Hee therefore sent to Lucilius the Consull an Ouerture of peace: who considering it well, gathered for many arguments from the present pottentie of the Roman State, waisted beyond expectation in the former warre, that hee willingly harkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Ile of Sicill. Secondly, that they should neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send backe into Italie, all the Romans, whom they held prisoners, without ranfome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirtee hundred and twenty thousand crownes: the same to be deliuered within twentie yeeres next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicill, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former sum; & required a shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not onely depart out of Sicill itselfe, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all other Ilands betwene it and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeeres without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwracke, about seuen hundred, and the Carthaginians about fiftie hundred: the greatnesse of which losses, doth serue to proue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of

of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Capitaine.

CHAP. II.

§. I.

Of the cruell warre begun betwene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romans hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicill, and all the little Ilands thereunto adiacent, gaue them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselves in a following Warre, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerours, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Prænerates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this weightie businesse. For when one of Prænermus, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, what peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present aduantage wth them; hee answered in these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidem & perpetuam: si malam, hæc disturnam; If the peace bee good and faithfull that you giue us, it will bee perpetual; if it bee ill, shew of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiam; an excellent, vllum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea conditione, cuius cum panisæ, diuina quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could belieue, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened state, than meere necessitie did enforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior vnto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued, than vntill they could recover their legges, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not onely private men, but Kings and publique States, haue more preuailed; than by any proper prowesse or vertue, withheld the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punick War was ended, Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gisco, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiency, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gisco had an especial consideration of the great summe, wherewith Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time, that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arriued. Herein hee dealt prudently. For it had not been hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue beene friendly discharged, and a good prescience left vnto the second and third, whilst their dis-iunction had made them them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would bee contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due : and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers ; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed ; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublesome. This must bee done by some colourable words of perswasion : for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca : receiuing euery once a piece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge ; leaving behind them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came backe for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne ; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods ; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellows arriuall, and their owne pay. Buiuesse they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawne to mutinie : the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should bee, when all their money came in ; how much would fall to euery single share ; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians ; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten ; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinaire largesse.

Thus the time passeth away ; vntill the whole Armie being arriued, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich ; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all ; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought ; with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them ; all which were to be considered in their Donatide. Hanno begins a very formall Oration ; wherein he bewailes the pouertie of Carthage, tells them, how great a summe of money is to be paid vnto the Romans ; reckons vp the excessive charges, whereat the common-wealth had bene in the late warre ; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse : for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greeces, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceiued the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought ; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serue to appease them.

Hanno would faine haue allswaged their furie, but he knew not how : for hee lesse vnderstood their dissolant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of so many Countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning ; some, for want of skill ; others of set purpose ; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sence, are best beleeued. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne error. It is a good rule,

Curandum

Fortibus & miseris.*

Haue speciall care, that valliant pouertie
Be not oppressed with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath also bene carelesse in providing to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might follow. Shee had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto she was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue bene dispersed ; these hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had she retained in shew of kindnesse, she might haue vied them as Hostages, for her own safety ; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of Warre, she hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be vied as an instrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages : especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched comfalle, vpon the liberrall promises made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their owne plot, and to deale the cardes which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to do as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis for the Souldiours ; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euery and anon some of their Senatours into the Campe ; who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreame to another, they make the Souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the Citie was driuen ; which cannot choofe but adde much insolencie to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wile, and finding the season fit, labors to make a great harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their hopes, in publique seruice of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiuing their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat ; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians ? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision ; or their Captaines direct them, where to fetch it ? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy ; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the Warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners ; who might easily haue bene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the first. But now they make no end of crauing. For whilest the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this Corn-monie, the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controuerfies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choice of Gisco partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friend to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africke : partly out of a dislike which they had conceiued of Amilcar ; for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Gisco comes among them ; and, to please them the better, comes not without money : which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calls vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the seuerall Nations apart, rebuking them gently for that which had passed ; aduising them temperately concerning the present ; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other than a meere tyrannic, though it were so, that they themselves were a great Citie, and a popular state. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent, since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardless of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very flauies; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of seuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should haue riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from every one: but every one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hathenough; but (as Coucrousesse is neuer satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stocke, though it were indeed a good yeerely In-come. Therefore he deuiseeth new tricks of roberie and is not better pleased with the gaines, than with the Art of getting. Hee hateth for this, and he knowes it well: but he thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspiratour to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can thinke vpon none other feraritie, than to dis-arme all his Subjects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place, and for defence of his Person and state, to hire many lustie Souldiers as shall bee thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne COUNTRY: for if not every one, yet some one or other may chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vn honest that can be found, such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose onely fauour they are maintained. Now left any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to fault, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames; though some Englishman perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historic, lighting vpon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannic growes to stand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

1. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie over her Subjects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: A tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercenary Souldiers.

NOW concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subjects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore, to secure her selfe by cruelty. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needs the lesse, to plucke from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, diuice her to necessity, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie summes of money: the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous & hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Cato) the Ropes of solid Grand-mother (Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and be without guilt: these words were accompanied horrible, though hee did her no harme. And I neuer reckoned it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame vpon her flauies; that when she sawe as whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gallies, and vied all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherewith a dominating State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villany, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

Altho it notwithstanding, it shall appeare, that the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Notwithstanding the appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall haue need of the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome Incontinent, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that hee might regard of his grauity, might not hinder the people, from calling for a newe Banked Courtians, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common probability and general approoued custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysicall abstractions of the qualitie, all from the singular, or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is composed. And therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, than vnder many thousands. The reasons prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate they are, they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reforme him; all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successfull may proue bene.

Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthy Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent forme of Government, euena lawfull Monarchy. But they that liue vnder tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hopes: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not leaue the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightier Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall vpon the same sort of men, of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Gouernor comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends; who meane not to returne home empty to their hies, without a good lading of waxe and honey. These flye into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or what hee couereth, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour (yet it must be vndergone) and such as every one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Gouernor is purchased with gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of his Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that haue bene acquainted with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law, De Reperendis, or, Of Recovery against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to restrain their Princiuall Gouernours, who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed, though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of indignation. If the Subjects of Rome groned vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those that were vassals vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthen some tributes, tributes, they loved not to heare, that their Empire was rigorous, they condemned many noble Citizens, for having bene ill Gouvernours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, setted as Presidents to induce another, every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and hee was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the government of Verrus the Roman in Sicil, that is lively set out by Tullius, may serve to informe vs, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verrus vnder-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more general Propositiō; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subiect Provinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyranny of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their subiects: and againe, suitable to the hatred of the subiects, is the iellousie of these Lords. Hence it followed, that in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African souldiers, in Africk it selfe, they had rather be beholding to others, than were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick warre, thinke his mercenaries out of their own Countries; Vt Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africk, melior procul ab domo sumunt uerget, miles, quæ mutui pignorum obligat suspensio facerent; That the Africans might see in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were whigged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries; for they were subiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not onely by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere desire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon proprietic of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the vse of Mercenarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries.

THE extreame danger, growing from the imploiment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, deuourers, and destroyers of all places and countries, whereinto they are damne, as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often; & in time of greatest extremity, not onely refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but resolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realme of Naples; with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan, who being entertained by Queen Isabella of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden, and forced her to put herselfe into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race Duke of Millan, who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaves; euen with the very same Armie which themselves had leised for their owne defence. But Ludowick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iudgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in losing his whole estate by the treacherie of such faithlesse Mercenaries, as his owne Father had bene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Dutchie, together with his person, into their hands; hee was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches vnto his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes against his neighbour Princes; hee could neuer either by perswasion or force, get them againe ouer the sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude, that soon after followed.

followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syrac the Turke was called into Egypt by Sauar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What need we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Brittaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland, but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the vnited Provinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed these Low countries haue many goodly & strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue seldome been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: and the like necessitie made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill spare vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenarie souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowicke of Nassau, felt to his griefe, in his retreat from Groeningham, when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either sought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse, or at least, by meere countrounse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Mambrin the Duke of Aniou, brother to the French King; saue that it is folly to concele what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraigne Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples necke? Well, he liued to repent it, vvith griefe enough. Euen whilst he vv as counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginative sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to be surprized and wonne, the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had happened; shewing that they were his own French, who stood in need of pitty. Then was his feigned passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; vvherin, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulez vous faire de moy, alias, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serue to proue, that there is little danger in vsing mercenarie souldiers, or the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient vnto necessity, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a king, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soueraignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall war; when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a king too iust & wise (though engaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their neighbour countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receiue; but well affected vnto the cause that they took in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, vnto the side vvheron he fought; yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, vvhere the English would haue rewarded him with death, if that his faith had bene corrupted.

by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helpes, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, iniurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country, of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a Countrey be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenary, and forraigne auxilliary forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy, against whom they are entertained.

†.IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gaue them assurance to vse the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindresth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

Here it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse seruice of other souldiers in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne Citizens: for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion: if strangers, how then could they auoid the inconueniences aboue rehearsed? The answer is, That their Armies were compounded vially of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Heturians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times (though seldome they did employ so many,) ten Romane Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had been wanting: which serued to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation, yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they inioyed, made them allured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, seemes troublesome to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of severall aduantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subiection. But still they haue been reclaimed by Warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply bin punished; and the people by degrees haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in proceesse of time it was granted vnto many Cities, and those farre off remooued, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne; That all the Burgeses should be free of Rome it selfe. This fauour was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to releafe vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had been wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a ready way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the renew of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innoation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome; they haue refused it, & held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Petellia, a Citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to indure all extremities of warre, than vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing been faithfull to the utmost. Such loue purchased these milde Governours, without impairing their Maiesty thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their own, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning therunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other helpe of their own subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

vnto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity whatsoever: For it is lesse difficult, (whosoever thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honesty, than to turne aside from it, yet commonly our passions doe lead vs into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vnuly appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least wile taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is wonder: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to insinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldome bin hereditary, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the government hath bin reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holdeth, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? Why did the Athenians? Why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good, how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publike? If they were ledde hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, diuided and subdiuided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of private hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must be faine to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; eury one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise vnto bruite beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeild obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise natural, in conuenient measure, both vnto Mankind, and to all creatures that haue sense; so for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite; euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuill forme of Iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vserfull. Neither thelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an vproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions, as descend no lower than vnto bruite beasts, are held lesse vile; & perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse, that permitteeth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessity doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more active, and pleaseth it selfe in the excellen, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are eury where to be found: for this quality troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it incounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is propter suum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned vnto those, that know how how to increase, or preserve humane nature: all honours, great wealth, riches, dignities, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to assist, trample, on Astrucy. Cesar and Alexander, haue vn-made and slaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the error of blind iudgement, in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it growes to ripeness, is none other, than Feritie: this name that Christlike faith to bee worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no lesse than Perurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony & Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Phryxus are examples, that vsed their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind; are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were afflicted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen and slaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is natural, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authority, which one Free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countie: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterly rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when he said; Have dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire; and every liuing thing that moveth upon the earth: which also he continueth vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. He who gaue this dominion vnto Man, did giue also an appetite to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselves, proues them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturally slaues.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a seruant, whom he hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two because he is his money; or else by the captiuitie of the Midianitish girls, which were made bond-slaues, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath been very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that he should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-seruants and maid-seruants, which were none other than slaues. Christlike Religion is said to haue abrogated this old kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are deceived that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whom he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, craving it as a benefite, not vrging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: as thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou mayst be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured libertie vnto many, not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear, of being discovered by their slaues, vnto the persecutors of religion. Mohomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; saue that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-seruants, vntill the time of our last ciuill wars: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaues were made free, which were of great vse and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurfes and other the like trades; slaues in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not, Aristotle hath well proued, that it is naturall. And certainly we finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, man, in the nature of man: who cannot but be in a distance in that of the old story, but who will extend the most foolish by far, great regard to the most ancient of good order, to the wisdom of beasts. Therefore when Commensuration hath giuen way to Reason, it hath made the most in the ground even of Masterly power, and of obedience, which is the true correspondent. But may be truly said, that some countries haue continued long without the vse of any (slauerie) as also it is true, that some countries haue had none the vse of any (and castell). Indeed the affections which uphold ciuilitie, are thought more noble, than simply needfull, and the satisfaction either of our kind, waile Lust, and the like, of our very best, as well as of them, which not withstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and ferocious dispositions, haue liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the danger of the life of sea-faring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the sinne of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, who are weary of their own more painfull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, implanted by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall estate of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in it, that are the basest of slaues.

This being so, we finde no cause to maruaile, how Tyranny hath been so rise in all ages, and practised, not only in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but euer by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices haue likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honorable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vsed well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? In the government of wit and children, some are vtterly careless; and corrupt all by their dull conuenance: others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: and to preferre the Weale publicke aboue all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue iustly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages afford not many examples. Hechior is named by Aristotle, as one of them; & deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans own countrey. But if we consider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountain of all goodness: we shall finde, that no morall vertue, how great soeuer, can, by it selfe, deserue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for pattrenes hereof, such as David, Iosaphat, and Asaph were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soone be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without inforcement either of aduersitie, or of some regard of state, a procurer of the generall peace and quiet, who not onely vseth his authoritie, but adds the trauell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Iudges to doe iustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, ciuilitie is infused, euen into those places, that haue been the dens of sauage Robbers and Cut-throates; one that hath quite abolished a Heathen Law, by which an whole Nation of his subiects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue & vvisdome doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wines, and the goods, of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appear lesse regardable: he, I say, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthy to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder such a King, it is likely by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknown; that Ciuitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subiects shall cause the Nations farre off removed, to wish him their Soueraigne. I need not adde hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, euen his bodily exercises, doe partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspokeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Left any man should thinke me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I adde hereunto, herquens, that such a thing is neither helpe nor aid, and may cruse: yet so wadome and same shall let him free from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time, One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit, though there be many other besides: redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodnesse: The example that liuender a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Soueraign Lord, but also of courage, and no greater in number of men, than of stout fighters, it need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as ouer slaues, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slaush mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and slaues outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yielded vnto slavery, vnto finally, is found true, that Hannos faith And beneath a man of half his vertue, that dogge may be cast him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably haue spoken, in the general discourse of Government: but where so liuely an example, of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the vse of mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians, I thought that the note would be more effectual, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercenaries was diversly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable successe. The bloody counsailes of the Mercenaries; and their final deffection.

BEING now to returne vnto those Mercenaries, from whom I haue thus farre digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seekte their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all bene subiects vnto Carthage, then might they iustly haue been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeoured to subuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These vsing the aduantage of their present strength, besieged Vtica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the western Hauca of Carthage, where it is diuided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing inwards vpon the great Lake, Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay filthily to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countrey: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the businesse it selfe awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides, & therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs, from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came vnto the very walls of their Citie. In this exigent, Hanno was made their generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making al good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoever was needfull, as well to relieue a Town besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these prouisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vtica, so suddenly, that the enemies as men surprised, forsook their Trenches, and retired themselves vnto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies iourney off; presently entred the Town; to shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceiued, that he knew not how to vse a victory; they assailed their own Camp, and with great slaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within Vtica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with futable indifferetion: losing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The

The Carthaginians perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their three anchor, sending to the field their great Capitaine, Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seuentie Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enemy vpon equall ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to win the onely Bridge, by which the Riuer Macra, or Bagradas, was passable vnto these, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This riuer had not many fords, nor those easie for a single man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept such guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailling in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selfe, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Town, wherein to lyc commodiously, intenuie onely to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had obserued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vsed to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine custumarie winds, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that slow riuer, till the wind falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vse; and taking his opportunity, passed the Riuer, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident grauity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their own Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption, when more than fifteen thousand of their owne society, were come from Vtica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resolu'd to charge him on all sides, and beat him downe, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him, watching for some aduantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Reare, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fit for the seruice of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made he lew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they folloiwed him so nere, as would be little for their good, if he should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, euen to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries presently fell vpon his skirts; beleueing, that for feare of them he was ready to run away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driuen at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about; and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of vnexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrow, there were six thousand of the Mercenaries slaine, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Campe at Vtica, others to the town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns reuolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recovery of their freedome; he perswaded Spendius, and Antaristis, that was a Capitaine of the Gaules, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwayes to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himselfe continued to presse the Town of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from country to place, as his businesse required, to take such wayes as there were: for all the country lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted them, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian

* Vtica is seated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not farre within the Promontorie of Apulo. At this time it is called Porto Ferrato, or Porto Ferro, by the Africans, from the iron shackles, called Aleba, Niger faith, that the Towne it selfe is ruined, and the place, whereon it stood, now called Mazachares. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, sixth Siluer. As it flourished before Carthage was set vp, so did it after Carthage was throwne down by the Romans in the third Punick Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cesars Caesar, that worthy Diuine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Cicero, the African, who lost it little time of that Trium, and hath written the storie of his euacuation.

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naransus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion for to get the acquaintance and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend; promised vnto him his own daughter in marriage; and so wan from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naransus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approprate his own valour, to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and foure thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himselfe, with Autarius the Gaul, escaped to doe more mischiefe. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, aspiring to win from them, the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, to respectiue onely of their priuate benefit, & carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betray them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; & that it was needfull, to look well vnto Gesco, & his companions, whom these traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemy Gesco would proue, if he might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autarius, and speaks his minde plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desirous to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course euery one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that such as would speake here-again, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the souldiers, & could speake sundry languages, in such sort, that he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuerthelesse there were some, that for loue of Gesco, sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they rooke, should be serued in like sort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: vvhich rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achitophel. All Israel felt heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; thou shalt be the hands of all that are with thee, but strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellows, if they be more innocent; and to auoid the punishment of lesse offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue been wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to vvhich may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their severall crimes. A coward thinks all prouision too little for his owne securitie. If Phocas be a coward (saide the Emperour Mauritius) then is he a murderer. To be stedfast and sure, in taking reuenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensetie against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise wile would haue repented; and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians, teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentleness, as the introduction, to extremitie and griefe. Like vnto the errors of Princes & Governours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater; he that hath aduocated to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconueniences, Mercy and Seueritie, vied with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne foliies were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanity was ready to inuincethem. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honour and shame; he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance, casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be deuoured.

Vntil this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, & done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, since his losse. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremity, as threatened vnto ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he ioyned his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now performe nothing, such was the hatred between him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Towns of Vitea and Hippagreta, that had stood alwayes firme on the Carthaginian party, did now reuolt vnto the enemy, murdering all the souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouision brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, was lost inoule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger, of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as I haue) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages bene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities, Athens & Rome; which other States and Princes haue often imitated; persuading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equal commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength: For hereof all Common-weales haue bene ieaalous, hauing bene taught by their examples, that haue made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venerians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in managing the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made ouer vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two as, as considered in one desire of Triumph, which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeers seruice; it is no meruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end, than victory. Vntil dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls in one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their ioyne Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much conceit, as say of the vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often bene such, that the lesse able Capitaine, though of equall authority, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by setting two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great, and most dangerous overthrowes; whereof in the second Punic warre we shall haue examples. On the contrary, in their warres most remote, that were euals managed by one, they seldom failed.

failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which serued the Athenians in the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper beene better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades: their affaires had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicily: the one being so over-ward, and the other so hasty, as all came to nought that they undertooke: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Countre and Common-weale most remarkable service. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall discretion and valour, but either one hath more of furie than of iudgement, and so the contrary, by which the best decisions are as often ouerslipped, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was slaine after the Battaille of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chastilian, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth, yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an aduancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, but reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admirall intended to win by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduertured to lose, by being over-confident in his owne courage.

But we neede no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present business: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded love to Hanno, and were vnwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them: The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Camp, which he did, & Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho the Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie, and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduventure much; hauing in their Campe about fiftie thousand; besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuerthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad. Antenor, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicily hee assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gaue the Romans force, what to trouble their digestion, the Principalitie of Syracuse would soon be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to the shame of noble disposition, which was indeed but counterfeits, as the sequel manifestly proueth.

Whilst Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligently waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more streightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desert from their valiant attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zurca an African Captaine assisting the rebellious, came vpon them to finde Amilcar worke, leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the business. The Elephants of Carthage, and the host of Narada, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plains. Wherefore he betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes, in all which the success was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day: still interapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the overthrow in plaine battaille: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their aduancement was enough to perceiue their owne disadvantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight, fight; but a waiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might reach them, to dare impossibilities, vied the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their victuals, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deferred any fauour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremitie, that they were faine to deuoure their own companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatened their Captaines with what they deferred, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zurca, and Antenor, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they sent to craue parley, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, & so commanded to lay hands on them: thereto forthwith went to fetch with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africa. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Narada, su, and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeeld: Pica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deferred vengeance; and Tunis being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedy victory had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behooued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his owne destinie, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with great and vnexpected furie hee sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner, on whom, and thirte the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege, but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagrada, wher he intencped.

The reuour was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the same of this losse; than had beene the ioy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Capaines suruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the intermixture of one sole Generall, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to deuise about reuenging it. But thirty principal men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day.

day. It heere touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this war lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane season Matbo was come abroad, as meaning to vse the reputation of his late successe, whilst it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matbo, that he resolved to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matbo: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approved it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft, Matbo, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, to which had bin well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing beene often victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of liberty should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future & present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matbo himselfe was taken aliue. Immediately vpon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victors. Matbo and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The war had lasted three yeares, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subiects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driuen out by the Islanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

Whilst Matbo & Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africa; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia; where murdering Bastar the Gouvernour, & other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Island to their own vse. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time); consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuiued on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that common-weale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all iequitie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue vndertaken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them: as secondly, when offer to partake, and to assist the iniquitous purposes, which they haue in hand: It is indeede the best way, that desperate men can deuise to reach other, to performe some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kinde of cruelty, did the virginate full Matthias murder a Garrison of Carthians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Didonians; by Aratus, vvhio, when he had formerly posselt himselfe of their Citie, by right of war, did not onely spare the sacke and spoyle therof, but gaue them equall freedome, with the rest of the Citie vnted. These Reuolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depredation or destructions of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. C'est les coups de vieille egrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fighting.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matbo among them, to negotiate with the Inhabitants of the Prouince. The Islanders were no lesse glad, than the Soldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrey: but they could not agree about the proportion of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the Soldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the Soldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, between Spendius with his Mercenaries, & their African friends, if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vvhile the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey, the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to satisfie themselves in it. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Komans into it, with as good right, as the Namertians had called them into Seil. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had reliued Matbo and Spendius with emmes of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof vvas made a great complaint: so that the Komans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade henceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meer regard of greater profit, vvhich kept them so temperate; no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole state of Carthage depended at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had bin overthrowen by Spendius or Matbo, in one maine battaile, that mighty Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of mercileffe villains, or haue humbled her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessitie, whereinto Matbo reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not free from such a miserable choyce. Wherefore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite them, but sinking ship, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Ambition put off her goodly vizard. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet againe; began to strike at hot head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denouced vvar against this enfeebled and impowerished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made in aide against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Roman demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike for the not what reason they could alleadge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of vvarre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony vvas paid, how hardly fouer it was raied. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punicke faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

S. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke warre.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell, serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easily took place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puillance & Empire. The strength, and the ieaousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknown to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repaire their decayed forces, vvith all needefull supplies. Of the Spanishe Expedition, the charge and soueraine trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom his Country did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his meane, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse, aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld & enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine yeares that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vestones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his son in law vvas made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of vvarre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow ieaous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauē, in the Kingdome of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them selfe, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and neereff neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vtterly destitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spain. For though it were apparant, that the Spanishe affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bin suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceede any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howsoever the generallitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pillcs, to auoid all occasion of warre with Rome yett the brauery of one man might proue more fiditious, and presenting the iniurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole Countie in the quarrell, that they so much desired, and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparant cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He proceeded no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent countenance inserted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had beene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had also bin exorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace, whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perurie, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceiued by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistress ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blowes from a stouter Dame; their were soone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-seruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, & were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie; and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome.

¶ Neuerthelesse, if we consider the late agreement, made with Asdrubal; we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spain; in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome yett had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countie. Howsoever it were, this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of help from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries, or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In some termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight yeares: (being slaine by a flane, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

S. V I.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punic war; and the vacation following, betwene the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, vvherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole Countrey had recovered by degrees a forme of libertie: the petty tyrannies (bred of those inferior Captaines, which in the times 10 of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not only serued to defend themselves, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had bin in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach vpon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdome of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lyfimachus, Selenus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie yeares; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bin already shewed, but by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiers, euen 20 at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gauls, he was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, vvhom he compelled to receive his Garisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; vvhich was iustly termed the fitt of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betwene the Aegean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betwene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of vvhom I finde nothing else, than that he vvas thought to be poysoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicaa thereof, and got it from her 40 by a trick. The deuce was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, vvilling him to court Nicaa, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widdow perceived not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as ready, to consent, as vvas his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Herevpon all Corinth vvas filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of vvhich, Antigonus vvvatched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Lady, whose ieaousie had bin exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauity becoming his old age. But as he had stolen it; so vvas it againe stolen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeares. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Etoliens, and Achaens, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, vvas a young child when his father died; & therefore Antigonus, his vnckle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince;

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crowne at his death: This Antigonus vvas called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship, and was also called Dyson, that is as much as, will-give, because he was slow in his liberalitie. He repressed the Dardaniens and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Vpon confidence of this good seruice, he took state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Herevpon the people fell to mutinie; but vvere soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouvernment. The Achaens tooke from him the City of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; 10 and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuill dissention, which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it easily now againe, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authority therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaens from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greekes. By the equallie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by 20 their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Law, and to vie one and the same sort of weights, measures, and mony.

Among the Sicyonians, was the first that vvnited them againe; and gaue them courage, as that they had bin by the Macedonian Capraines diuided into many Principallities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subiected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclides, which Talamenus the son of Orestes posselt the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gygas; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their 30 State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance with some small changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, wherof Helice, and Amor Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battails of Leuctras; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a war, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomis the son of Lagus, Lyfimachus, Selenus, and Ptolome Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patenses and the Dimeis, vvnited themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, vvhich after followed. For hauing bin, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Capraines, and others hauing bin gouerned by petty Kings, they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italic. Now 40 about the vvniting of the Patenses and Dimeis, to whom all the Cities of Tritea, and Pharis ioyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for manye and five yeares, vsed the same forme of Gouernment with the Achaens; who by a Senatorie and two Prators, ordered all things in their Common-weale; and soone after, by one Prator, or Commander: of which, Marcus Caryneus was the first, and Ar 50 Archidamus second.

Archidamus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, vvhilst his Countrey was oppressed by Tyrants, found meemes, through the helpe of some banished men, to enter their own Citie by night, with ladders; whereto they charged the Tyrants; and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus the King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greekes, than in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the 60 Achaean league, which thought that time it receiued more increase by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conuention serued vs little against against Antigonum, whose subtiltie was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league, so further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of 150 talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuersies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Euergetes King of Egypt, who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuersation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by some theues that he had hired for the purpose, who liuing in the place, had practised to rob Antigonum his treasure, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonum his Souldiers were rather overcome by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing lost the advantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disparation, to Philosphers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approued) might looke pale and tremble, when he began battaile, and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, & in a manner confined, vnto severall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vie, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrie he was vnreprouceable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truly testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soone after from Antigonum, and entered into the same Corporation. So did the Trezenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew to powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos & Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon the Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamus, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ranfome, to allure the Citie by shew of loue, yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slauers to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entered it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue sent any helpe to the recovery of their owne freedome; sundry times, and with diuers euent, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose vpon one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: untill at length Antistomachus the Tyrant was forsaken, perswaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilest this businesse with the Argines was on foot, Lysias the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue liberie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man): euery second yeare, for a certaine while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turns. But those late Tyrants, and now Citizens, Antistomachus and Antistomachus, were carried with private passion from care of public generall good, in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare in due time.

The

The Achaens hauing obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land, made open War vpon Demetrius the son of Antigonum Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in vvhom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter feruit, aut superbe dominatur; it is either base in seruice, or insolent in command. Netherthelesse when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by many, which he could not by force; & corrupting the Capitaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, vvhom thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaens, louing them, and speaking vvell of them, vvhich was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entered not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worne glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Aetolians, in the vpper part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it selfe, waxe very powerfull, by sturdiness of body, & rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antistater and Craterus; partly by daring to do & suffer much, partly by the naturall strength & fastnesse of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, vvhich called away these famous Captaines to other businesse, as hath bin related. They had molested Cassander in fauour of Antigonum, & were themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Aetolians, a little, but a stout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the son of the first Antigonum, & more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedonia succeeding him. They likewise held often War vvvith the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Ephians, & many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetuall trauaile; seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardnesse ill deferred the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship; measuring all things by their own insolent wils, & thinking all people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Aetolians had lately made great spoyles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had invaded the friends of the Achaens; taken and sacked Tellus, where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonum Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driuen to seeke helpe of the Achaens; which they obtained. The vvar vvhich the Achaens made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Aetolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerced from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Aetolians, giuing thanks in words, deuided how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaens were desirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance & Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedemonians were very ielous. Wherefore these Aetolians laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedemonians and Achaens together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called in to helpe it skilled not on what side, and so get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonum; offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdome had sustained by the Achaens. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedemonians cause to take Armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had bin meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedemonians to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaian.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subiect to the injuries of any stronger Neighbor. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Aetolians entering Lacedonia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand Slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice & Lucre reigned among them; the poore was oppressed by the rich, & the generositie of spirit; that had sometime bin abridg'd generally vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta not more than seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands; all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lycurgus's lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of Lands: All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this; but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leontidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings, who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leontidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends & Counsaillors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private Commoditie. They were hasty to take away all debts, & cancell all bands, for they themselves were deeply indebted; but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindered, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leontidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome; and the two aduerser Kings driuen to take Sanctuary out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and thereby his enemies condemned & strangled, together with his Mother, & his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; & setued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adioyne Lacedamon to the Achaens Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue bin wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achaens, euen in their own kinde: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should haue bin the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leontidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his own son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, & sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So conuining himselfe to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted by his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they & the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegæ & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedemonians; wherein his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights trauel, & discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorrie. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, & therefore would haue staied the quarrell from proceeding too far. But Lyfias & Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so virgent. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the Achaens, (He and Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Achaia, and required his assistance in a iournie to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would therefore therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus who desired to gaine battaile. Yet had the Achaens twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedemonians, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus, which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuertheless the Achaens would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeare following, against Lyfias his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous words of Lyfias. Therefore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, nere vnto the Mount Lyceus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare; so that he was thought to haue bin slaine. This misadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue bin expected, had he bin victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could vndertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before ioyned themselves with the Achaens; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus wonne. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaen societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered nere vnto Megalopolis; where the Achaens had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lyfias, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, broke vpon the Lacedemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Achaens against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaens being weak, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull iournies, forsooke the Achaens warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where he slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the Citie; he iustified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it lately had done, to saue it selfe from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any aduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Achaens hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Acadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and ready to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, he proceeded more roundly in his worke, being better obeyed and by better men. His Lacedemonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principallitie of Greece. He did not therefore benedict contend about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to wint or lose all.

all. The Aetolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantinea, Tegae, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrey, and saw that Antigonus, with the Aetolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore he deuised how to prouide against the worst, and rather to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to saue all from vtter ruine. The office of General when it was next put vpon him, he refused; fearing to be so far prest, as to hazard in one battaile all the force of his Countrey, to which as he had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted to by surprise, & defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the tribes, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seems that priuate passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantinea had not onely opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the *Achaean*s, was now reuolted vnto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the neerenesse of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vsfull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall heereof, Aratus praised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the *Achaean*s.

The Citie of Megalopolis had bene well affected to the *Macedonian*s, euer since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some speciall benefits. At this time it lay neerest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deferred succour; yet could not well be releeued by the *Achaean*s, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lacke of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecessors; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aetolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the *Achaean*s vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiu care to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the *Achaean*s good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to haue bene grounded vpon any hatred to the *Macedonian*s, but onely vpon a iust and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis; and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The *Achaean*s were glad to heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisdome of his Countreimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safetie: adding neuertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that hee had not bene Author of this Decree, but onely followed, and that leisurably, the generall consent.

Neuertheless

Neuertheless in true estimation, this finenesse of Aratus might haue bin vied, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had bin more honourable, to make an end of the War, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power, which they gaue vnto Antigonus: since thereby he should both haue freed his Countrey from all further trouble; & withall should haue restored vnto the vniuersall State of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the *Macedonian*s had bereft it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pity) that Vertue hauing risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed itselfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principality, by length of time, and successe of many actions, can ill endure the hastic growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likely to be ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the *Lacedemonian*s there was none; than that they lately had bin in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was iustly plagued, vvhhen he saw his own honours reuerbed by the insolent *Macedonian*s; and instead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posterity of Hercules was faine to do sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a god; and was finally paysoned by Philip, whose Nobility was but of hisse descents, & whom perhaps he might haue seene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the *Macedonian*s, the loue of Peloponise was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had vsed to the *Achaean*s; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disbursing. Cleomenes himselfe, vvhilst this businesse with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Armie, and laboured by all means to draw the *Achaean*s to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the *Macedonian*s. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had so great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the *Achaean*s were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted vpon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponise; but suffer the *Lacedemonian*s (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in warre. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, & all his prisoners ransom free: also that they should enioy their own Lawes & Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the *Achaean*s; who desired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had euer bin since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea or since the Persian inuasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindered all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat; & thereupon fell extreame sicke, & so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheless he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant more other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the *Achaean*s in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Antigonus was violently bent against it; & fought by great words, & terrible threats, to make his Countreimen afraid of resolving. When all would not serue turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safetie of his person. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this aduertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had bin an easie matter, to haue told him so much at the first; and not haue made him come so far with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seemed to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners, who fought thereby, either to make him waie without the Argos, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himselfe into the Citie, then to depriue him of all Royall show, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, & for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person: lest the people, hearing the promise of Cleomenes, satisfied by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargain without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these iuggling trickes: and Aratus was not farre behind with him, in as bitter an Orat[i]on. So betwene feare of the one, and reuerence to the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weakness, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeldded vnto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time; but come presently to relieue the distressed Achaens. Antigonus to haue good words as could be wished: saying that hee vterly refused to doe anything, vnlesse he might first haue Acrocorinthum put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserued, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found, for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what hee intended, were minded to arck him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes, who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might illue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the Barbarous Macedonians; and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he giue him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receiue of King Etolie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraignty of the Countrey; hee desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be iointly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreaty serued to no purpose. For Aratus, rejecting vterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as a Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthum into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seised vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, wherof this his Aduersary was native.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Isthmus; hauing passed with his Army through Euboea, because the Ætolians held the streights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedemonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard bataille, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came nor well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: he secretly got into the Corinthian Hauens; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no lesse troubled his enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes bin enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbore to chafe out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to beglad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that hee would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done at Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places where it would haue been tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not doe the like abroad. So theyooke their time; inuited the Achaens; assailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he vnderstood by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost lost: he began to feare, lest his labour in guarding the entry, should grow fruitles; the Achaens in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsooke his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: vvhich if he could saue, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he preuailed at his coming to Argos; that both Argiues and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leauing him Master of the streets: when the horsemen of Antigonus were disquered a farre off, hasting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yeldded, as soone as the Spartans had turned his backe) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had bin long in getting.

Antigonus hauing shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, vvent into Aradia; where he vvan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes; and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his vway to Ægium, vvhv was held a Parliament by the Achaens; to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake braue words that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde with him; but made him Capitaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into covenant with him, That they should not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than hum an honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: vvhich had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes that would haue bin a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore, and wanting wherwith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Achaens. This vvas hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthum with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreaty. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spitefull. Neuerthelesse in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the ayde of these Macedonians. For with extreame torments he did put Aristomachus to death, vvhv had bin once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens; and from them reuolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achaens. For he slue all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bondslaves: diuiding the spoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The town it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colony of their own, and Aratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse; than euen the flattery, which Aratus vvas driuen to vs. Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of ferillity, wherinto they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to speake of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achaens; Let vs returne into his warre against the Lacedemonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wane Tegea, Mantineia, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphussa; Mantineia he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens: with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territories. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineia, & to those other Townes that he wan, vvas this: He had few Souldiers, and had not many enough to wage more. Ptolomie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vnlesse he might haue Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolomie vvas slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his own ability would serue. He manumitted all the Heilotas, which vvere the Lacedaemonian slaues: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus nere at hand in Argos. The towne he wan: but after he was entred, all that vvere fit to beare Armes, rose hastily against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them againe, if they would be of his party. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achaens, at Argos: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes vvas safely gone home. Therefore he returned them backe to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of his vn lucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieued Achaens. When he had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes vvas at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argiues perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; vvere very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he vvas wiser than to be moued with their clamors, and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that vvere more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words, rather than he vould be ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honor than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto Lacedaemon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troops; meaning to requit these braudo's of his enemy, vvvith the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the vvar from his own gates; and therefore entred vpon the Country of Argos, where he made such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Country of the Argiues, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtus; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Tuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were all light things; y^e offered to dis-hearten the Achaen side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of little importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his rest, without any more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirotes, Boeotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achaens, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, vvith which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus coming vnto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hills of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, vvich he greatly desired, without the hazzard of his whole Army, in assaying their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolu'd to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaen foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foote, incamped in the freight vally between those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts, and not only

disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclydes, his brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, norooke such benefit as the ground afforded; whereon he lay. Philopomen the Aradian of Megalopolis who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a priuate young man, among the Achaens. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall back vpon the Army following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achaen horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places; untill they receiued a signe from him, which was as yet. Philopomen perceiving them to be more orderly, than wel aduised; sentreat some of his own Countreimen to follow him: and a charge on the Spartans; & forced them, not only to leaue the Illyrians, but seek how to saue themselves. Being so far aduanced, he found the place vvich the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be wonne, through the skilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to do the like: the folly of Euclydes being manifest, vvho kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euen termes. So he recouered the Hill top, where though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, untill the whole Army came vp to him; by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, vvith great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclydes, made Cleomenes lose the day: vvho fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, vvas like to haue bin surrounded and lost, if he had not vvithdrawn himselfe vvith an extraordinary speed. In this battaile ended the glory of Lacedaemon, vvich, as a light ready to goe on, had vvith a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left of fixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile; and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lyc in his own power, for their good, he halted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) & imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He vvas louingly entertained by Ptolomie Euergetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdome, and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour and qualities. In the meane season he had a pension allowed him, of foure and twenty Talents yearly. But this Ptolomie died; and his son Ptolomie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, vvholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vvithout full of all vertue, and hating any in vvhom it vvas found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, vvith the troubles in Peloponnesus, did seeme to inuite him; Ptolomie and his Minions, vvould neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismis him (as he desired) to trie his own friends in Greece, because he vvas too vvell acquainted with the weaknesse of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him, vvas; that vvith thirty of his Countreimen, he vnderooke a desperate enterprise: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrines to rebell and seeke their liberty. In vvich attempt he slue some enemies of his that he met; and hauing walked vp and down the streets vvithout resistance (no man offering to take his part, or vvich is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Vpon his dead body Ptolomie was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had bin taken thither as Hostages, together vvith the vvives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such vvas the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, vvho had caused Agis, vvith his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloody end, as now befell his own Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Selasia, Antigonus vvithout resistance entered Sparta: vvherein he won the force of any Enemy, before him, could make vvay. He kindly adreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer than two or three daies; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an aduertisement that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight a few daies longer; or at least-wise tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedaemon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouercame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer straining his voyce; whereas he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, vvhich was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Protonia Philopater; began to reigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Protonia, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seventeen yeares of his reigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is visible in the minority of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon vvhich occasion, vvhether it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece, and how they were subdued by the Romans.

While things thus passed in Greece, and while the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spainne: the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corcians, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted long; being rather, as Linus saith, a tumult than a war. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meete to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Countrey now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making war for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians; his friends, that were besieged by the Aetolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Aetolians contended about the booty: the old Praetor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoyle to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had vwon the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Aetolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, & the new Praetor, should be ioyntly intitled in the victorie, and haue equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, & after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Aetolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own busines, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Aetolians were slaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoyle, & went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Aetolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agrippa King of the Illyrians; not only for regard regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the Rourish of this Orbitus, he found it not vncle to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the Illy warlike. For to be thus to be killed, and drinke so immoderately, that he fell into a Phrenisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tolus his wife.

Tolus gaue her people free liberty, to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if they had bin sole Mistressse of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet, and sent it into Orbitus with her Captained, to make vvarre where they found advantage, without any farther respect. Thie fell vpon the welterne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleians, and Messinians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed in the Citie of Phoenice, to take in victualles and other necessities. There lay in Phoenice eight hundred Gauls; that having bin Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrippa, then Bras, to the Romans; but failing to doe either; they neuertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed, and cast into Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirians, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were loone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phoenice; vvhich desired none other in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and hastned to driue out these vvwelcome guests. But while the Epirians lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Serdilaidas, whom Queen Tenta had sent to help his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement; a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Towne, & the streights adjoining, by vvhich these new commers must enter into their Countrey (another part of them remains at Phoenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, shed vveill in this businesse. For Serdilaidas found meanes to ioyne vvvith his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phoenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirians, as made them despaire of having that Countrey, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Aetolians and Aetolians: craving their help, with very pittifull tearmes of entreatie. They obtained their suite; neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to preface battaile vnto Serdilaidas. But Serdilaidas was called home, by letters from Queen Tenta, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no time to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition; which was accepted. The agreement was; That the Epirians might ransom their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their booty and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargain; the Illyrians returned into their own Countrey by Land; sending their booty away by Sea. At their coming home, they found no such great trouble; & that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandment of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilest they lay at Phoenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Tenta, that she should abstaine from doing such iniurie. These Embassadors found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the towne Issa, vvhich her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by true name, Piracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That iniury in publicke she would do them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commodity; how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans haue a manner, & a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publicke, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publicke authority: therefore vve shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slaine: as if that had bin the way; to set her heart at rest; vvhich vvianded the Romans so disquiet and affright it ever after.

The

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Postumius. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this iniurie is, of such nature, as must be requir'd with mortall war. It is indeede contrary to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadors: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to be this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of vvar and destruction, therefore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should passe freely, & in safety, between enemies. Neuer thelesse, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State, lay hold vpon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadors (thus employed, to make the war more terrible, as it is to kill the men of war, & subiects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedemonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes; to draw him into a vvar vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, vvhich practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law vvhatsoeuer. For vvhetheras the true Office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassador do it without incurring iustly the same danger of punishment, vvhich other Traitors, in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Civilians, and go on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassador Corneilius.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an error; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epheians had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had the easily vnmoulded, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; & that neuer thelesse, it prevailed as much, by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she would haue continued to vse her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, vvvith such good caution, that she should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she list. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, & one part of it fell with Dyrachium, the other with Coryra. Dyrachium, was almost surpris'd by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Coryra the Illyrians landed, wast the life, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achaïans, were called in to helpe; vvhich came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcius Gargæus, the first Prætor of Achaïa, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Coryra, disiniaid vvvith this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius of Pharos; vvhich took possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrachium. In the meane season, Tenta was angry with her Capitaine Demetrius. I know not why; but so, she refused to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which vvvay to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; vvhich he found the Town of Coryra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed along the coast, to Apollonia, accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailler and guide. To Apollonia came also Postumius, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, numbered at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasted towards Dyrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperst themselves.

From

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Risum, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behinde, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to beg peace: which she obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the rest; & from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of war, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, vvnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadors into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Country, and how, for good will therunto, they had made war with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, saue a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betwene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italic.

The Gauls that dwelt in Lombardie, were the next, against whom the Roman tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes vvvith their own forces, and sometimes vvvith the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that war proued not answerable to the beginning; if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to vvar, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than vvvomen. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwayes careful heed to their approach, were it only brought. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumults Gallici, tumults of the Gauls: and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italia, and vsed to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Having receiued an ouerthrow; they would rest ten or twelue weeks, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred vp again, by younger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive vvar, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls neuer fell vpon Italic with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was traouling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punicke wars: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italic, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had bin bold, to set vpon the Gauls in their own Country: and that was three years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italic. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Etruria, and besieging Arretinum, had with a great battaile, and slaine L. Cælius with the most of his Armie. Mannius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about ranfome of prisoners. But these Embassadors they ſue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it ſo well, that they expell'd theſe Senones out of their Country, & ſent a Colonie of their own to inhabit it. This cauſed the Boj, another people of Gaul, to feare the like meaſure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their ſide. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battailes, and thereby made them ſue for peace, which laſted vntill this end of the Ilyrian war.

It vexed the Gauls, to see a Roman Colony planted in their Country; who had bin accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinos (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpinos, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their dis-junction had caused their losse, so their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the busineffe was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpinos and Transalpinos, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would fene to people the whole Country between Arcona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virgins, or Gaiians it self, would not ouer-ioy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in for good part, notwithstanding all danger ioyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadful President extremely displeased the Boj : who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displacement. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to refuse, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees ; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchy of Milan, joyned with the Boj, and vpon a common purle entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzer : in these times, The Gessates having received great Imprest, came to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus and Aneroeslus : who with the Boj and Insubrians, compounded an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer invaded the Roman Territorie ; to whom, the Senegalli, that had bin beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Centomanni, adhered to the Romans : as better believing in their prosperitie & rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milne : with the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscan. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Emilius to Rimini, to stop their passage ; and in the place of C. Asilius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscan.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gauls had assembled, they caule a view to be taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: vvhich were no lesse willing than themfclues, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulles they sent forth to the war foure Legions of their own: euerie Legion consisting of fise thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misaduenture came to the) of the Sabinis and Hetrurians fifty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; vvhich Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Embric and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanis, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to invade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the generall Armie of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all vncertaine chances of war, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Over and about the ſe great troubles; in the Roll of the Lubines; that was ſent vnto the Senato; there were numbred foureſcore thouſand foot, and ſixtythouſand horſe; in that of the Swabians; ſeventie thouſand foot, and of horſe ſeven thouſand; in that of the Saxons; ſixtyſcore ſixty, fifty thouſand foot, and ſixteene thouſand horſe: the Lucans ſenta liſt of thirtie thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the Marſi,^a Martucini,^b Ereuntians, and the Volturni, of twenty thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe. The Romans had alſo two Legions in Sicily, and about Tarentum, containing eight thouſand foure hundred foot, & foure hundred horſe. So as of the Romans & Campans ioynly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were regiſtred two hundred and fifty thouſand foot; and of horſe, three and twenty thouſand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thouſand foot, and about ſixe thouſand horſe. Caſting vp the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans & their Confederates, it amounted to ſixty hundred thouſand foot, and ſeventy thouſand horſe. But the number is ſomewhat miſſe-caſt by Polybius; not with a purpoſe to enrich himſelf by the dead paies: for where hee reckons nine hundred horſe too many, hee ſaith ſhort nine hundred two hundred of the foot.

How great foeuer this Muster was, it seemes to haue been like vnto that, which Lodouick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subiects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them in-into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trafymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slaues, euen for want of other Soldiers, after their overthrow at Cannae. Wherefore the manuaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmes: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gauls keepe on their way : and entering into Tuſcane, deſtroy, and put to fire and ſword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Army, ſent into Tuſcane, hauing taken ſome other way than they did, and finding that it had miſſed of them, came againe ſafe after them, to arreſt them in their Iourney. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head : and in the ſame evening diſcouered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent neceſſity, that fight they muſt. Wherefore they helped themſelues with Altraegena : that is, hewed no great ſenelle of fvyt, but ſuch, as well beſemed thoſe that had none other occupation than warre ; and ſtood them in good ſtead at the preſent. In the dead of the night, they cauſe their foot to march away, but not farre : leaving their horſe in guard ; to vvhom they giue order, to come off at the firſt light of day, with ſuch a ſpeed, as might rather argue a running away, than a reitrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their haſty departure, as the Gauls deſired they ſhould, follow them in diſorder. The Gauls retorne, charge them, and kill five thouſand vpon the place; the reſt take a piece of ground of aduantage, and deſend themſelues, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their ſuccour. Vpon the coming of the Conſull, the Gauls conſult, whether they ſhould giue the Romans battaile, or forbear. In which diſpute, Anacæſius, one of their Kings, perſwades them, rather to retorne into their owne Countries ; where, after they had diſpoſed of the great ſpoiles and riches which they had gotten, they ſhould then renew the warre, being without carriage, beſter, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace, for ſeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the ſpoiles of their enemies; they thought it wiſedome, to hazzard neither it, nor themſelues, any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had been in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath been found extreame dangerous, to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire doe often turne head, yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either a height, hedge, ditch, or place of disavantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier

knowes it, as well as the Captaine; but he which forsakes the field, perceives, and fears some advantage of the Enemies. For which is the betrayer of these succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make the retreat, are always in feare to be abandoned; they that lead the way, feare to be engaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, & perith, if those that saue the retreat, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable ouerthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503, vpon a retreat made by the Marques of Sal, doth testify no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by ouerturnings, the Spanish foot ouertook, and defeated them vtterly. During the wars between the Imperials, & the French, Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauery would needs see the Enemy, before they left the field. So was Strofi ouerthrowne by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersley, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (nor finding themselves in case to giue battaile) haue done. Je ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraite; I finde nothing in the art of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retreat. A sure rule it is, that there is lesse dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue giues this iudgement of a dayes retreat, made in France, presently before the battaile at Moncontour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that vworthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncontour with so great resolution, as he saued the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse, and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Amilius follows them, as neere as he can, without engaging himselfe, attending his advantage. In the meane while, Amilius the other Consul, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gauls, inclosed between two Armies are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear, and Front. To sustaine Amilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanes; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting vnder the Riuers of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Amilius the Consul: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Anerastus; with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal ouerthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italia. For they were inuaded the year following this ouerthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their victory: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirty yeares time, to the Gauls, to repaire their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boj; but by reason of the great rains that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Furius, & Flaminius, inuade the Milanes; and, presently very far, being strongly assisted by the Genouani and the Venetians. Neuertheless these Consuls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, & compelled to resigne their Office: because the Amures, or South fayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not onely foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation from the Senate, & being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hable to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then perused the letters, & returning home obtained a triumph, for against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrey of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Maieitie of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grant of Commission, did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the fury side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in puerile of time grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed, M. Caudius Marcellus, and C. Cornelius Scipio were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that year. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as being a way to vvorke. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, & ioyned with the Insubrians; & other discourses, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consuls halted into their Prouince, where they beleaged Acerre, a town not farre from Nouaro (so far had the Romans pressed already in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them from this siege, Britomarus far down before Clastidium, a towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces, leaving the rest, with the Insibrians, to attend vpon the Consuls at Acerre, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vpon their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greater part of the horse, and fixe hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him vpon the way: so suddenly that the Romans had no leisure to refresh themselves after their iourney, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauery, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode put single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous king: whether more in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to comfort him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne mentooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much word of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman General slue the General of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph, whereof onely Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipios, and diuers other Roman Capitaines, especially Cesar, were better men of warre than any of these three, though they neuer offered vp to Iupiter, Opima spolia. The Armour of a General slaine by himselfe, when they were Generals, nor perhaps afterwards to doe.

After this victory, Acerre was yielded to the Romans, & Milan soone after, with all that belonged to the Cisalpinos, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times made the Citie so sick, brought to nothing in a short time, their pleasant and fertile Territories possessed by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italia, Germany, as vould not submit their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to band on their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Outlawes and Thieues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, as they did vnto the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before; (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) and once in the reign of Numa, nor in long time since the reign of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long: a long and tedious warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer been, was to come vnto them, which being euell ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchie as far as their ambition could reach.

more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded, that Embassadors should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of their Confederates, which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him; if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they liked themselves, upon the report of these Embassadors, and thus their gravity in being not too rash at first, would serve to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadors, Lince reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of sinceritie lesse questionable, that they found him at Carthage, and had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal's whole course. And surely woe might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Lince confesseth), & fall to disposition about the conditions of peace, if they had rejected that which was sent upon none other pretence, than pre-emption of warre.

Which the Embassadors passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces; but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicill had done for the Romans; and unloose his hope against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani Nation adjoining to Saguntum, & having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbors) of which Hannibal himselfe had hatched a spire. Finding therefore such an occasion, wherfore it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him, ere he meddled with them, he made no more ado, but sat down with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens; for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Neuerthelesse, he was glad of any hand, some colour, to shew his actions, not onely because the war, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an oppressor, before he could set foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell, as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hasty to the war, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, until they had an Armie in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the scene of the Warre.

In the meane while, Romanus, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them; either for that he found himselfe over-ruled by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an untractable disposition. The commotion of the Garses, and afterward the state of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had acquired of their gifts. But he was a Traitor to his owne Queen, and therefore dealt according to his kind, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he burnt ships; & spoiled the Isles of Greece against the commands to which he was bound. Then he advanced himselfe, & staid upon some place, wher the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might have spoyle better. For the business with the Garses, was ended with Hannibal not through his beguile, when he declared himselfe free by his doings, as enemy, and not a queller. The Roman Consul, Scipio, was sent against him, and did such damage to the strong towne of Dimalup, and other places, through such excess upon them, as round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves up to him, paying him tribute in paine. And yet the Consul, Scipio, in which Procurator, prepared to resist, which he might have done long, if he had not been so much beguiled by the promises of Romanus, that he should be made King of the Garses, in the Isle of Arctia, if he would there be some representing himselfe the next morning with his ships before the towne, and offering to surrender himselfe, & to pay tribute with his persons, if they against the Consul, & yet he was not released from that duty, by this day in ambush. Wherfore he fled away through by night, & so ended, when he had shipped ready for him, and imbarqued himselfe: leaving all his estate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it. This business, though it were soone dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum, before which Hannibal sat downe, ere Scipio was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes vnable to move. Neuerthelesse he was not vnimodfull of his worke in the meane while; but gave order to raise certaine movable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the Citie; to add to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall, wher at an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which upon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued even to their owne trenches and campe. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did give ear to the townsmen with continuall traualle, that at length it got within the wals, and was onely hindered from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines; that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himselfe out of the towne, to treat with Hannibal for some reward. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so severe, & without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countreymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the citie: yea, the citie it selfe to be abandoned by the citizens; promising, that he would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they have better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and saved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did by whom their wives and daughters were defouled before their own faces, and all put to sword; that were about fourteen yeers of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying vnreueged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them in the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slownesse, in forbearing to send help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherfore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadors against Carthage; demanding onely, whether it were by generall consents and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with milde words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was vrged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian Generall) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeed worthy examination, or dispute, is whether he were lawfull or unlawfull for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For he longs to vs, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them: according to their faults and errors, to you, to challenge vs, if we have done any thing contrary to our League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Scipio the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made, for by your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treatie between vs and Lullatius, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disallow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and precise varrant; the same liberty may vve also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lullatius the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better, to have dealt plainly; and to haue alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Ile of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which periurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie; and forthwith inferred their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie was with Asdrubal, and all other businesse between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman iniuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoeuer we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which we haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge; forgetting, in heat of contention, as Polybius takes it the best of their Plea. Yet since Lullatius himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Asdrubal with desire of reuenge: vve may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards had long been thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plain termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberia; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had bene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, & purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out: at once. Euen which of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely friuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer bin maintained by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustic sword, and the emperie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of covenants. There haue bene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise understood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne advantage: and commonly (seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing the best aduised haue rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonians with the French in Naples, Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprise as many places as he could, et the war brake out, Don Iohn with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbargo he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of iniuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice being ready to take his journey into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvell, if the impression were strong in him. But as he grew up, so did his hatred against them. That it is inhumane, as boqueram harred in this sort, as is shewed by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of these Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africk. His journey into Italy.

W^{AS} he being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put vp his sword; which he had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill he had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre, second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spaine in his absence. He also tooke order, to send a great many troopes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk threethousand, eight hundred and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the * Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine, which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage itselfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that wayed most in these several States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. He also selected his brother, to guard the coast and Ports of Sicilie and Gaules; whereof thirty seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations strangers; he left with him about twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk, he sent Discouersers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountaineers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italy, and not bee compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and discouersers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he passed ouer the River of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of footmen and ten thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, he now subdued; and appointed Hanno (not that old commander of his horse, who sat still at Carthage to govern Spaine on the East side of Iberus, whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking wages; which that others might not also doe, for a reward, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Next day it came to passe, that the journey seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, & twelue hundred horse, he passed the Pyrenes, & entred into Gaules. He found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but won them, with gentle speech, and rich presents, that he bestowed vpon their Leaders; touching his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the banks of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the River, a people called Volcae. These were troubled with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gaules that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Niuarerz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrey of Daulphine, phing, thinking to defend the further banke againe him: yet such as remained, being very deliquis to free their Countie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Countie-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattell wasted by the long stay of so great an Army as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer: and lent him guides: When the Vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse, he sent Hanno, the Sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies disperfed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruellously feared the water. Hee was therefore driuen to make raffles of trees, and couer them with earth and Turfe; whereof he fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge; to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defend it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from thence he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himselfe extremely incombrd by the Sauoians: and lost both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plaine Countie on the other side. And whereas this iourney ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, hee was every day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountaigners, but withall extremely beateen with grievous weather and snow; it being the beginning of Winter, when hee began, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory; gaue them great comfort and encouragement to go on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§ III.

How the Romans in vaine solicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The resolution of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THE Countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face can ye Romans perswade vs to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines to be more wised, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue beene vnterly rooked, and destroyed by the Carthaginians, whom they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we; and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Citizens) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our hands; who are resolved, neuer to make account of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gaules, using their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italy through their Territory: and withall greatly glorifying in themselves, believe their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to scorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italy, entertain a war which is doe meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our selves, and in our owne Territory, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deferred so well of vs, & the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadors returned home; carrying no good news, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gaue hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boii, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countie) to flee to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time, when the Gaules, hauing little skill in assaulting Cities, were wearied, & seemed desirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting, that they might thereby hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish: For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained, Maenius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the relief of the besieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a strong ambush in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Prætor so opportunely, as hee was vtterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered by swimming, a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, G. Asinius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent, to relieve the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates; which forces were taken out of the Cæsius Aemii, and supplied by a new levie.

As the Gaules were too rash and hastic; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war: They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost feruently endured for many indignities, in time of this late peace, would be so long and so courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy itselfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other to be sitting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way towards Africa, with an hundred and sixty Quinquagena; or Gallies; of such an oare, which proportion may seem to threaten euen the City of Gastræ, to which it fell most dangerous. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa into Provence; and used such diligence, hauing the maine of his force, as in sixe dayes he recovered Massilia. There he was aduerted, that Hannibal was passing the Rhodanus, whom he thought to haue found before yet in Spaine; Maenius had also newes of the Consuls approach; which he was not without glad, nor sorry, at not promising to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discover the others subtile and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beateen: yet could not the Romans greatly begge, hauing scarce, only, two hundred, and thirty of their owne, one hundred and forty. When Scipio drew neerer to haue met with the Carthaginians, he found, that they were gone three dayes before, and that as he then found assuredly true, with an intent to look vpon the walls of Rome.

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Neuerthelesse hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to trie what might be done against Asdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa, and so passing through Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troops of Mannius & Julius, that lately had bin beaten by the Gaules: with which forces hee made head against the enemye, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourney.

Scipio the Romane Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battell at Trebia.

FIVE Moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourney from Carthage; when great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foote at an hundred thousand, & his horse at twentie thousand; others report them to haue bene onely twentie thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lavinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that ioyed with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when hee marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight & thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of which, all saue those remembered by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaines; which muchiefes had deuoured, each, their feuerall shires.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countie of Piemont; he sought to win the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends, and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore hee assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their spoyle serued well to heauen his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more ado, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countie: which ioyed, or was all in readinesse to ioyne with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arriual, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had bene heard of his approach: many (as it were) came friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians, whom neuerthelesse they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generalls hasten to the trial of a battail. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Consul whom hee had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, should meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaines; and the great spirit of him hee met. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's success, and sudden arriual. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to vnderstand hereof: & letting him further know, that whereas hee had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now in their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speed, to saue Italye it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lidyrum, with direction to land the Asiaticus Ariminum, a Port Towne not farr from Ravenna: quite another way from Castra, whither hee was making hie. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neere, that fight they must; & they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a present example, that hee shewed vpon captiue prisoners prisoners of the Sauoyans, which hee brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having bene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to bee deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to receive his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Every one of these vanquished men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselves out of slauey. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetual slauey: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Riuers, the great distance from their owne Countie, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impudent imaginations. Hee therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case, seeing that there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, as hee had euer had bin broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, hee told them that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, & in view of their owne Townes, who knew as many waies to saue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, to which nothing seemes impossible, did no way presse them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, that there was no mean betweene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Capitaine of France) la commodite de la retraite aduance la fuite. The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a flight running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that hee had given order for the laying of a bridge, ouer the Riuer of Ticinum, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet hee prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not onely so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigantes and Theeues, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (said he) yea your flies may make judgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so many troubles and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not onely beaten by quirs, and driuen back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to disperse by foot, famished, and pre-

people, both in Africa; and in Sicill. It was not long after this, ere the two Generallis met each being far advanced before the grolle of his Armie, with his Horse, and the Roman having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground; and the evening of the encounter. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their troupes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the mettal of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Darte, for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieve them: their hardinesse deferring his aide; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he adventured himselfe so farre; that he received a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilest the Romans were buied in helping their Consull; an unexpected storme came driving at their backes, and made them look about how to help themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Romans in flanke, and to compass them about, whilest hee with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose looks were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all tooke to their flight, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisdome, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first pulse of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extreamest of the tempest overtook him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stole the retreat; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left sixe hundred of his Rere behind him; who were the last that should have passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein hee followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, salutari milites arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubts the success, or finds his Army fearefull or wavering; it is more profitable to take a safe retreat, than to abide the vn certaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the River; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe, the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Antiochus, Antiochus, and Gessates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to help themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell upon the Roman Campe; wounded and slue many, especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate, with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians and presented their seruice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismissed them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a retreat, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him. Following him selfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their Campe, and thereby given time to all, save some few in Rere, that were slaine or taken, to passe the River of Trebia, and save themselves.

being vnwilling to remaine by reason of his wound, & withall finding it expedient to abide the coming of his fellowe Consull, incamp himselfe strongly vpon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet his dishonour in his reparative Recovery day, more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian side, among whom came the day, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their own Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, stopped the taking of Clastidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundisian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse received, seeing that in manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicill, awaited his coming. Hee therefore hasted thither, & from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Consull desired that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal drew off, the fortune of the late fight; and by what chace of misfortune the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid vnto the retreat and motion of the Gaules.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts, sought by all means to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victory, which hee had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. Hee also feared the election of the Consull: his owne time being well-nere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary, obiecing the vnskillfulness of the new-come Souldiers, and withall gaue him reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of leaving the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the Rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily haue avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was according pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; that would feare the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: when being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that they might haue done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for these fautes, and to set them at libertie, hee had vnderaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his owne Carver, and to wake them thereby force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they did not send Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done, though because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal, Scipio cared not much for this: hee suspected their fallshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to preserue their Confederates from suffering injuries: whereby might be wonne the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent oute thousand horse: which coming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy laden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest euen into their own Campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who could not retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to backe his owne men; and to fight the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawn forth; and a battaile ready to bee fought, if the Carthaginians had not given way to the Consull, who would haue it called, made the Romans in general desirous desirous to take the maine chance in open field: all the persuasions of his friends were in vaine, he was resolute to fight. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he both thought himselfe how to hope forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: hee found in the hollow of a water-courfe, over-grown with high reede, a fit trench to contain an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, hee had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse; to braue the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner; ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitie to fight: and therefore not onely issued out of his Campe, but forded the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the knee-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, sixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battallion, guided on the flanks with threethousand horse: thrusting their light-armed, and Dartes, in loose troupes in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian humbers of foot, were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse, they had by far the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rode out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies sword, and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompensed with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaigne, being by farre inferiour in horse, and withall thereby subiect to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds and wood-lands, would haue bene of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossely ouer-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his footmen with empty stormes, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and pernicious, than to present an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generosities of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got there with Inno Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres, or would not persecute him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreame danger, flying through the Countie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neuertheless hee got away, and returned to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

S. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Trasimene.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vsuit for seruice; to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to respect the winter, were warme in Placentia, and Ceremonia. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to be very quiet: but vexed them with continuall Alarmes; assailing diuers places, and taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lyguriens to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Consuls, and Treatises, two Colonels and sixe Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in secret places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde: those of their followers he not onely well intreated; but sent them to their Countie without ransom; with this protestation, That he therefore undertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countie the seat of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them; at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger; and these that gaue him the aduise, were ready soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that he might not be descried, nor knowne, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine he would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gaules, till he had scene more Swallows than one. At length, when the yeere was somewhat better opened, hee resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions; and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends, abroad, than in their owne Countie. The passage of the Appenine Mountains was troublefome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romane Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter; that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourne. Neither helpe to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance & fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue bene erected vpon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscanie. In those Marishes and bogges, hee lost all his Elephants, saue one; together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deep mire and water. In briefe; after he had with much adoe recovered the firm and fertile Plains, hee lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Romane Consuls.

G. Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilus had of late bene chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilus, a tractable man, & wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator, who hauing once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse hee quickly finished the warre. This iaculous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when hee entered into his Office, lest his aduersaries, by sayning some religious impediment, should detain him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors; but he neglected their intunction, and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore hee provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman; hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilus came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countie between Fesula & Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true, that a great Capitaine of France hath said; Plus gaigne on en este pas perdu; A wasted Countie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many aduised him (which had indeed bene best) to haue patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare; saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went beating downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore hee took his horse, and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a least; saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their ieaousie, both hee and the Senate that did giue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire, which whilest the Consull thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal so vnadvisedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue onely where that great Lake of Persia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slaine in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carkasses of his Countreymen. About sixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair, of sauing their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not any way discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the ayre was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellowes. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought to be gone, ere they were discried, and attacked by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner, since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For deserted they were, and Maharbal sent after them, who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering vp their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, That it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter covenants, or adde vnto them what they listed, if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidioussnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fiftene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, he set free without ransom; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way, to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall safetie, but onely the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of slauerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two batailles. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, hee increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Servilius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Carthage; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular ieaousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had bene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to bee preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honor of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had bene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue bene so hasty to fight, before the arriual of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, as proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly auow it, that by being continued in his gouernment of France ten yeeres, Cesar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there bene euer yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue bene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to inform it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpees, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernment, fitting the Countreie, they haue bene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer bene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

S. VI.

Now Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingering warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successful attempting; adventures rashly vpon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did was, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an ouerthrow, that when Pyrrius had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrius his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee only sought honour, and fought, as it were, vpon a brauerie: demeaning himselfe like a common enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name, against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bin out of vse, and created a Dictator: The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto controll of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and sat no longer time than sixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too busie off, the People looked upon them as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dictator by their election, to Quintus Fabius, the best reputed man of warre in the City. Quintus Fabius, now named Quintus Fabius, trarie vindice, contrarie courses. Quintus Fabius chose M. Minutius Master of the Horse: which Officer was customarily as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amiss in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion bene also good. But it was true (as Livie reports it) that the Bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of detioration; then must we beleieve, that those Bookes of Sybil, preferred in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified, as hauing not bin rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceedes alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne allue from Thrasimene, may serue to beare witness; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Rivers were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cin. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilus the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuied in hast: and from Arminium he received the Arme, which Seruilus the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and vsed all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare arms. Passing by Spolium & Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that he had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Army, fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; & (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northern Region of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrquies, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ran, hee had not taken any one City: only he had assailed Spolium, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great thing. This the Protestant Arme found true at Poitiers, a little before the battaile of Marston; and their victorious enemies, anon after at S. Iean d'Ally. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprise, & should detain him, and give the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as hee as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of baitado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers and vsuall civill men. They were Boyes, in warre and in blood; crayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and dangerous by many victories there; & of late by some notable ones against the Romans; and such as had no other feare of the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. If therefore hee attacked this Carthaginian so neere as hee kept him from doingling too farre, and presented the colour of his viter spoyle. He injured his men, by tittle and litle; and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and he brought them fast to look on the by, so that in the end they might sit on his taile. Hannibal did not know what to do.

Now

Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminio; taxlog Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander: For men are no more moued with such noise; than with wind bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It walketh it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the inuading Arme that desires battaile; and this of Hannibal, was both the inuading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall vpon the most rich & pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Arme in battaile: but being farre too weake in horse, he alwaies kept the hills & fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warre Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, & that the Towns stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a farre off; he resolved to rest his Arme, that was laden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following Spring. But hee this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head, upon the hills of Callicula, and Castilum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrey; vvhich he had already wasted, into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by misere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Castilum, vvhence he might both assly the false citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, & hinder the Romans from coming neer it to prevent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him away another vway, from Castilum to Castilum, vvhence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, & won the victory, without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In diuining the country, he had gotten about two thousand King, vvhose homes he dressed vvhith dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the hills: The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a deuice to circumvent him; and therefore kept watch in his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, vvhhen some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs, & fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his vvhole Arme, reconered sure ground without molestation: vvhether he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iourney towards Rome: & the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner, keeping still on high grounds, betwene him and the City, whilst the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the inhabitants, which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none; but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was calld away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the Arme in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans & Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent. All the Arme was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by indgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warre Edius. In this folly, of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he beene peremptorily forbidden so to do: by the Dictator, the breach of whose command was exceeptive perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held vnder doubt of his owne, and the loss of the Arme; and the friends that he had at home, bearing off in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer to haue Minutius on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more courageous gamel. Therefore he drew neere, & to prouoke the Romans, sent forth his light part of his Armie to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians being vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not onely for his men but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrey at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order, presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers, who being disperfed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romanes took heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meere weakenesse, which held him within his campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldned Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless he did not such hurt, as he had receiued.

For this piece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spire, so far forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his own campe; & that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of discipline, and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cried out, especially Metellus a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Seruius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and He, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborne to spoyle some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspition) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Government both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authority, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie, thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will onely onely propound, That the Master of the Horse may be ioyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so iniurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publique, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit & authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that dignity, whose great power, had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had bene Praetor, vvas glad of such an opportunity, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow vvas the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very basenesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuectiue, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Government; That they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impoverish them by vvarre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise; and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceed as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude, in hindering the Decree. The news of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Collegue, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authority: whether that one, one day, and the other, the next; or each of them successiue, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour: Hee would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome; Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Liuius seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe: For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioyned in Commission, but haue each intire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both; without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiue (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius; by turns. He saith that Minutius was very refractary; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: vvhich thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to diuide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good this opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse careful, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Country lying between them was open and bare; yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse; and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouraged. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer, sometimes in the morning, to seize vpon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more tedious care, to busse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduventure vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he govt, he sent forth his light armie, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troups with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Capitaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himself by halting to do good, than by suffering his enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired; fearing to be well warded with a shewre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hills. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue beene saved. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded; colly as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neerer within kenting. He ran along all the coast of Italie; took hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed over into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrey, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, wherethey tooke charge of the Armie.

6. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces leuied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, hear the great commendations that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserued them from receiuing a great overthrow: but he had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the flow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to doe iust nothing. Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready euery man, to discharge the grieue and anger of his own priuate losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit over-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the

into bulpe, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People, who sparred not to give the liberty of his place; in saying what he liked, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen. That Minucius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have bene ouerthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all bene ioyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all as Master of the horse, that without a Plebeian Consul, the warre would neuer be to brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since bene aduanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the exacting fort, since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian;
a more new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could with any thin to keepe it, by well deferring of them. By such persuasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Tarentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his denacting from their honour, and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the Peoples fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Consuls could be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore Clodius was named for that purpose: and he againe depol'd; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in Choice of the new Consuls. This interregnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Trent, or Decuries; and gouerned successi-uely the place of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Liturs, or Fasces, carrying the Effetor, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained in times of the Consuls, and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrats of the said yeare, to substitute new for the yeere following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed not more, than to skip five daies, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well alluaged. Vpon such change of chiefe, there were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners; to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seek those Offices. But no device would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Tarentius. One Inter-regnum passed quere, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleued) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, onely Tarentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas many of ordinary marke had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnreppet, and hot-headed people of great sufficiencie, and reputation, should be ioyned with him, as both Competitor and oppositor, So L. Amilius Paulus, he who few yeeres since had ouercome the Carthaginians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdom, was vrged by the Nobility for the place: which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honorable man, to trouble himselfe in any suile. In such great businesse of the Commonwealth. For notwithstanding his late good success in Italy and M. Licinius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and condemned to death; wherein Licinius was condemned, and Amilius hardly escaped.
By this iniustice they shall put the Romans wile in mind, each of them in his second Competition, wherein they shall honorably appeare their worth, the one of them sobly grieving in the most glorious losse, the other bravely winning in the most happy victory.
These shall the Commonwealth

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the providence and care of Senatus, traiailed more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Servilius and Attilius, desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheless, to plicke the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slander, with which Tarentum and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised, is vncertaine. Four score thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varrus had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Here, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions. Having nothing more, than that one of these two mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing these two what euently balanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa, (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and counsaile were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Timon Gastulus the Sicilian, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more seruilely declare their puissance, than any though larger account by Poll, of such as were neuer drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus another of the Prators, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing bene their subiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they receiued, it is not knowne: onely this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money; by the shifts that they were driuen soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any scruple about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as possibly they could, without incurring the necessity of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him, wherein their successe for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not onely blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the misery following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him, lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Cannus: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not onely furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vntill they would be troubled with farrer carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrey, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many needfull to feed, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this misstep when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peerce, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command and not a part of the Countrey adiacent; it then seemed needfull, that vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduocate a battaile with the Carthaginians, rather than suffer him thus to tarry in the Countrey.

of Italy. Neuertheless, answer was returned vnto Servilius, that hee should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as need required. When all things were ready in the Citie, and the season of the yeere, commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their Armie, set forth against Hannibal. This was almes done with great solemnities: especially, when soeuer they went forth to warre against any notable or credoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attyre, with an honorable traine of the printipall men, (not onely such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loie; but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leaue taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Emilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his country remarkable seruice. Tertullus his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatnesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Paulus the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many good words, to shew his magnanimitie, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians; but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follie of his fellow-Consull. The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey: but if his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to aduenture vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diffinition betweene the two Roman Consuls. whether it be likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannus.

These new Generals, arriuing at the Campe, dismissed M. Attilius one of the last yeeres Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weaknesse; Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to confide, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to fet forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the state and safetie thereof, rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour; but that onely by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia & Thrasymene. Herewithall he betaxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darknesse, whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemie; and how disfigure the Enemie was of those helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Emilius was knowne to be, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not alwayes chruie. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should haue heart to fight; nor that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, hauing preconceived a victory, though all delays to beo impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was good conduct. They remembered what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the aduantage was theirs, why did he make them forebear to vfe it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius, who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than hee had bene in the Citie. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to bee freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they to fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Emilius would so too; but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeeres provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably euery day. Emilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come, hee doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless hee fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude wel come and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vantcoursers, and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus, sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. Hee neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemy; with whom hee meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall tearmes. Therefore hee stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Gerwyn, Canna, or some other place, where his force lay, for want of necessaries: whereas an Armie foraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Linie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had bene driuen; and of base courses that hee deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Linie) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. Hee had not money to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruely Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that hee knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsaile, hee resolved to get him as farre as hee could from the Romans, into the Southernmost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in pulling from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilest he was about to put this deuise in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Linie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused, as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith, Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam (dicitur) agitasse; Hannibal (s' said) 10

how hee sought himselfe of flying into Gaule: where hee makes, it no more than a matter of heere say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the poore people, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaule, through the Marshes and Pogs of Heturia, could finde victuals enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeere, especially seeing hee had plaid the carefull husband in making a great haruest; since hee had long bene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Roman prouisions? Suitable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and castell; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrey, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and laden his followers with spoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not ealie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwayes kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might hee so doe, hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men loeuely fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested, & sworn, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a senselesse deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that hee made all haste to get him out of it. And what should hee now doe there with his horse, or how could hee be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could hee desire to lye; hauing betrayed all his Armie; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Linie. But of this and the like it is enough to say; That all Historians loue to extoll their own Countrey-men; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde fortune; there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since hee had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vfe his owne authoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command, at the first break of the day hee began to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needlesse hazard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could allege none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? Hee had sent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and drave them shamefully to runne within their defenses, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Emilius perceived, that hee could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, hee tooke all care, that what hee saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot hee caused to be left behinde, in the greater Campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behinde him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie hee was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done, the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe; whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed the River over, somewhat higher vpon the Greene; which ran from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men, Hee had them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (audience) pray for any greater comode, than to dyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a liuell ground, where the stronger in horse are liue to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) yee are first of all to thanke the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them so long, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are faine to lose them. As for these Romans, it was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may euën encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee haue as often beaten as feared: Of one thing onely I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to drue them before you out of Gaule; and, to win the open Countrie, and fields of Italy, both of which yee haue obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, I search them neuer: so diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their General would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it was so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago about many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant onely to correct the sad moode of his brother with a iest, and shew himself merry vnto the Souldiers; this his answer, was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himselfe had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battail of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henry the sixt: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners, and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant iests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment, but few many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe, expressing no lesse perfection of his military skill, than was greatneesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which he had long before condeined the means to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slings of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdus; but when we used our owne termes, the Infra mure. The groffe of his Armie following them, hee ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymentum, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed, each after their own Country manner, their shields alike, but the Gauls vsing long broad swords; that were foyisible in a downe-right stroake; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their naueils upwards, is confident in their owne fiercenesse; the Spaniards, wearing white coatts embroidered with purple.

This

The policy of two Nations differing as well in their furniture, as in quality, made the same form, as men by their change. The first was a drawing of body and hurtling, and charges, before the onset, as if they had been to fight their violence at the first point, in such a manner all the force of them was intended to this day. The Spanish horse, as they were more numerous, and more accustomed to give ground; when they were forced, they retired to water, & returned the fight upon any small encouragement, and the roughness of the ground, and nature of the other, suited mutually to restrain both them too good and true temper in the place, which they held in this bat-tall, and the confidence largely was in them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly backed with Consequantian and other Africans, whose name was growne terrible, as their Councils, and in Gauls by this their present warre, Since therfore, they were so feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilst the other side stood fast: their Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to press, nor were their hardihood, so knowing that the enemy could not press without them, without further engaging himself, than discretion would allow. Hereupon they added the great advantage, which the Consequantian had in horse; by which in the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contrait was the same alike. Desperation became such courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as the Consequantian, therefore could the Gauls and Spaniards to advantage planting voided the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall whenever they should be overhandy pressed, not casting them into the forme of a Column. Hee made them as it were his Vanguard, the two points of this great halfe Moon, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrower than this, as serving needly to guide it orderly backe, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened & inclosed against all impression. The circle being so seemeth to have bene so great, that it included the Africans, who stood behind it, though such figures, cut in brasse, as I have seen of this Battaile, present it more narrow: with little reason, as shall anone appeare; in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were in the Reare, to second the Gauls and Spaniards, when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betwene the last ranks of his long battalion, and in the head of his Reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Betwene the left battalion and the River Ausidus, were the Gauls and Spanish horse, vnder the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide place, was Hanno (Lince faith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole summe of *Hannibal*s Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and Hee, sueto to three againt them in horse.

40 The Roman Army was marshalled in the vsuall forme : but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found conuenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long, as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disorderd troups might re-ally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Tarentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailling was very vnprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flank. As for Anniballus, it was not his duty of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wile they yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Riuer, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terrentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen and offended neither part; the Carthaginians being on their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, between the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and slingers

slingers of the Balceares: Asdrubal upon the Gaulish bank, and was himself recounted, not after the manner of the Gauls, who would not be killed, but about Thalys: but each gaining the right hand, Paulus and Scipio mounted the River on the one hand, and the mouth of the river on the other hand, so that there was no way left, but a direct assault, and therefore they did not only use their Lances and Swords, but trulling violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another, and so their horses running from under them, fell many to the ground; where falling again, they began to deal blows like to lightning, in conclusion the Roman horse were overborne, and driven by main force to fighting on foot. This the Gauls and could not readily: For Asdrubal, with his brother Gaius and Spinthars, was opposed resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequal both in number, and in the kind of arms.
 When the battailes came to fighting, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and somewhat more than enough, to break that great Crescent, upon which they first fell.
 So strongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spinthars foot make resistance, that the two points of their battailie drove towards the middle; by whose sides the Spinthars were forced to disband, and fly back to their first place. This they did with great haste and fence: and were with no little time and toly pursued. Upon the Asdrubal stood behind them, they needed not a fall foot, on both sides: For there was a wide room enough; and forasmuch as the heart, or plumes of this Moore, pointed towards the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to receive them, at when time should require. In this hasty retreat, of flight, of the Gauls and Spinthars happened, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or vnter combe of the halfe Moore, made the innermost or concave surface thereof disordered and broken though it were; when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes of points thereof, as yet, vntouched, onely turning round, & revolving very little. So the Romans in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken, and the botsome of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and teeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But while the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselves deeply with in the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so far, that getting beyond the Rearer of them, they encloseth them, in a manner, behinde and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Asdrubal; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparant, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would haue bene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of sight, and rashnesse of inferior Captaines: but since the Consull Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Confull Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Confull himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neverthelesse he cheered vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Confull receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme, yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his

the Numidians, lighted left vving, was maruellously troubled by Hanno (or M.
the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, about which, which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomedly, draue in and mouers of the Romans. These, vsing their aduantage both of number the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing charge, but continually making offers, and vwheeling about. Yet at they seemed to promise him a happy day of it. For when the battailes were to ioyne, the hundred of these Numidians came picking away from their fellowes, and hid behind their backs, (as was the manner of those, which they were downe their armes, and redressed themselves. This was good lucke to them, which had beene good meaning: Varro had not leisure to examine them, vnder whom they were, to get them behinde the Armie) to make them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduencurers did as he for a while, till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they yielded. Under their Jackets they had short swords and poyards, which they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slain, which they threw vpon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backs of the. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the same high ouer the first. Asdrubal hauing in short space broken the Roman troups in pieces all, saues the Companie of Emilius that rushed into the grosse of the, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage between the Roman owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell to the Beare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians:
he ioyned, and gaue vpon Terentius.
A full cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance, what weather it had left behind the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to thought it the best way, to auoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was wife than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his own perill; nor more in striving to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shrank backe, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue indured with their help. Now he found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another to encounter him. But of this; or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his proposals would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troups followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fitting for service. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing them, fell vpon the backs of the Romans, that were ere this hardly distressed, in manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily, vvhich before made them being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne, gan a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, not whither or which way, whilest euery one sought to auoid those enemies, he saw neere. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got vp and saued themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could is taken in this battaile, Linie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and adred horse: too few to haue defended for the space of one halfe houre, both in Camps, which yet the same Linie saith, to haue bin ouer-cowardly yelded may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the Story shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were has the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must labour five thousand more, who yelded in the greater campe, when their com-re either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls outright: which the Romans, ly the Consul Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Hells, nothing rable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thou-sles, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or therelosse not sensible, in the ioy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome, it is little doubted; the Warre had presently beene at an end. But he beleued not so farre in his operty; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use, a

Of things following the battaile at Cannæ.

De without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius he Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian; who regarding more the pleasure of hem, vnto whose honour they consecrated their trauailes, than the truth of id information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all nd proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites; ers conscript. No man of sound iudgement will condemne this liberty of cen-ch Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his iniuritie (such as it was) he pro-substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanity of mer Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill co-hering:
ines is to be suspected, that he would not haue taken, had he been borne in these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and been content aue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserved, of his owne
e. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others, and e some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that orkes of ther opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both ake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent.
this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of nd beleue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) babilitie. This attentiuie circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the icie, or forgetfulnesse, which we find in the best Narration, of things following ile of Cannæ. For it is said, that foure thousand foot & horse gathered together e Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got in-ulum, choosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Sp. Claudius; yet that full Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto those of Scipio at Cannussum; to the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him; that ouertrow. Among such incoherencies, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as belongeth not to some particular connexion with manner ensuing: mutual dependence in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman camp, and trussed vp the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium, finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, & make alliance with Carthage. The first towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cosilia, where he laid vp his baggage: & leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hastened into Campania. The general affection of the multitude, in all the cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves; who could not hinder him from spoiling the countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving respect vnto that great countesse (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victory at Cannæ, He had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their loue by gifts, pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all waies & means, to make them his, whilest all other motives were concurrent. As this time also he began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners, telling them, that he bore no mortal hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrey; & fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to chioose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their rancome: and together with these, he sent Carthala a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersity, and could stoop vnto desire of peace. But with the Romanes these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome; & not vntill the former generation vnterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as straightly conioyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not, (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the citie of Capua, answerable vnto the countrey, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauery is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud; and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other cities, that bore especial regard vnto the Maiestie of Rome, and could not indure to heare of Inuouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacurnius Calpurnius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their city to the Carthaginians shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourney into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the needresse of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, & free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) unable to hold any such negotiation, without aduices of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yield vp their towne to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithfull meaning, were driuen to sit still in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their own cowardize: The people holding so tender a regard of liberty, that euen the lawfull Gouernment of Magistrates grieved them; with an imaginary oppression, had now good cause to feare, lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, & by helpe of the Romans bring them vnder a more streight subiection, than euer they had indured. This feare being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacurnius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sat in Council, about these motions troubling the citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, & after to ioyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmlesse. This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priuy vnto their designs. Hauing thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuertheless to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue, He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Gouernours were surprisid by his policie, & all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should chioose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So bearing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chioose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, vnprovided for such a selection, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, basenesse, and insufficiency; or else euen because they were known, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacurnius intreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacurnius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for suauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obsequiousnes, to court the People, giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Wil, who else were likely to cast them down: All the city being thus of one mind; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Cannæ, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serue the Romans in the Ile of Sicill: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul, to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wherefoeuer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their State, and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost, and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Samnites. Herunto hee is said to haue added a foolish Inuocatie against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, & to feed vpon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as only bewtraied his own feare. As for the Campanians themselves,

He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came, & filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring to seek their owne libertie. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in War or Peace; and That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Romane prisoners, such as themselves would chooseth, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, opposed himselfe earnestly: vying in vaine, many persuasions, to the wilful, and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors vnto Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the towne: at which time hee gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; & therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halft himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples, which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well provided to lay siege vnto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the towne, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainments, he came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke, promising, that ere long all Italie & Rome it selfe, should be driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a traitor to the State: & vte him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him aliae, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanes: among whom, onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perella the sonne of Pacuinus. This Perella would haue murdered Hannibal, whilst he was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other townes therabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Accerta, were the Cities next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romanes at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreame feare of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Cannæ: and the griefe of that losse was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparant danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse already receiued, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noyse and lamentable bewailings, wherof the streets were full. Courtiers were sent sent forth, to bring about riding, how all went, wherof vvhether Letters from the Consul M. Valerius had throughly informed them; they varied in amazed; that they ran into barba-rous suppositions; & taking direction (as was said) from their fatal bookes, buried a- liue women in such wretched dances and Games, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl giue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke; that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Muse. Yes it is not improbable; that extreame of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sorcherers; whose detestable counsells they afterwards, for their own honor (as althames of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the Oracle of Apollo; & enquire with what prayers & supplications they might pacifie the gods; & obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their feare, though not serving to giue remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor Octilius, whom the Senate had appointed; if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Cartha- ginian Fleet, that waited the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles of Sicily, which was in readines to set vpon Lilyba- eum the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take foueraine charge of the Weale pub- lique; with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, & bid him welcome home; giuing him thanks for that he had not despaired of the weale publique. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtlesse) prouided wisely, for vp- holding the general reputation. If his coming into the Citie, had renewed the lamenta- tions & out-cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednes, among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thanks; they noyed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity & Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaining through. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Lucius would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, & out of great spirit, let me be pardoned, if I beleue him not. It was done fearfully, and to couer their grieif: had they dared to shew their indigna- tion, they would haue stricke off his head; as in few yeares after, Cn. Fulcius had his life brought into question; & was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smal- ler offence. M. Minus, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; & T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a 1000. horse: though with much difficulty, as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boyes. These foure Legions are elsewhere forgotten in accompt of the forces leued by this Dictator; and two Legions only set downe, that had bin entolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; foure new ones of Pretextati, or striplinges were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, & so few, little confidence was to be re- posed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them 8000. sturdy daues, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed; That whosoever ought money & could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the war. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set vp; among which, were 6000. Armors of the Gauls, that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romanes, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthago, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannæ, came to M. Castulo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captiues audience was giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransom'd at the publique charge; not only the teares & lamentation of their poore kin- sfolke, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their their fate; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to be so tender of such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alledged against these who now craped rancome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disburfement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaues which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had beene seuerer, when as indeed they were furable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Mercof it is no little prooffe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery oneth third part of a common Souldiers rancome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, wherethee hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for slaues might haue beene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuie men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuie men did onely lend these slaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the War should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would haue beene his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt onely for ready mooney, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, vpon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was vied toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euery) that which they call ragione del Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing injuries to priuie men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and thereto serue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre should be ended, how long soeuer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thrifty censure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, saue only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other harte-brained foolies his companions; who being frightened out of their wittes with the terrour of so great a losse, were deuising, after the battaille, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed as by a Tribune of the people; neuerthelesse it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparant than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie,ooke the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weak estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ostia, with a Fleet ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee was to defend that Island, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, hee sent these of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Canusium: deliuering the Fleete, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberat about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iournies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle tales haue beene told, how hee was met by Marcellus saying by false words, &c. terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. In such wayes, and not inforced with any publick force of discipline, but also a sure hope of the Citie, and Village abroad in the Country. But as it was thought, a worthy consideration, that Hannibal was Master of the field, which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vnto it done. So thought the Multitude, when they saw some, that had little feare of their own priuie want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Citie, giuing of these, one Labienus was chiefe; a stout young gentleman, and Souldier of speciall mark, well beloued in the Citie, one that had done good service to the Citie, was found by Marcellus, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle usage, giuing of daunce, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberrall gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to retorne the greatest thanks hee could to so courteous an entreatie. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same nature of the Gentleman; and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, found to wonder why one that had so well serued of the Roman State, had not repaid him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly affected for his personall valour, he made this Labienus to faile in loue with him, that he could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans; whereof he had not presently knowledge. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola, as he had done, formerly he had done, the Neapolitans; but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison, vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Alatrin; which he tooke by composition, and so returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being opposed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly beset and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Towne, and diminished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to shew of a meaning to force the Towne, which he sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages betwene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise, and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly aduenture, euen to find him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the vvailes; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three seuerall gates looking toward the enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the wailes were bare, and not a man appearing on them, then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very waile, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terrour was more auailable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the bravest performed in all that Warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict account of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up vnto the Romans, or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same forrall answer, which Liue puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow receiued at the Islands Aegates: yet the summe of his speech appears to haue been no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno, saying, that his hatred against the Barbines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a iest of these victories, as is reported, saying, it ill befecmed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had been beaten, or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoyle, to make request for meate and money. To these cauls, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of money and prouisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Afrabal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his iourney towards Italy) then might such an obiection more iustly haue been made vnto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and which he best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in warre.

What would haue been the issue of this counsaile, if it had been followed; it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely that the Romans often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue bin kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for reuenge of so many shamefull owne throwes, since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissiue behaviour could preferre Carthage from ruine, longer, than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and serued onely to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Nomians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should be sent ouer to Hannibal; and that besides these, twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be landed in Spain; not onely to supply, as need should require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be transported into Italy.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not haue found cause, to taxe the retchlesse improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannae to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Companes, would haue been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelesnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreame necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than sense of the publike neede; utterly peruerred, and made vnserviceable in the performance, the order that had beene so well set downe. The Elephants were sent: and some money peraduenture, vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Onely some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the iourney of Afrabal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recouered their strength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes receiued from their subiects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries; and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeming of peace, after the losse at Agathis. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Nomians; and Spaniards, besides those already on foote, are appointed to the seruice in Italy; and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeeres together bene forced to some extraordinary costs, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meane to enrich their Treasury; had the weakly Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, euen from Tyrrus to their Mother-Citie in the bosome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, about the Romans: who liued on the fruites of their ground and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the insupportable of Roman fallhood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the enuouise was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Army did set forth, to performe whatsoeuer should be enioyned them, with condition that their City might not bee destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yielded vp all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Townemust needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize; by which yee now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies; and make them very apt for conseruation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing words plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoeuer it were, he added still this conclusion, That Tiberius; and the Carthage should be destroyed; He may seeme, not onely to haue had regard vnto their present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the City, but much more vnto these times, and the great height wherunto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, one of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare to be a Warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skillfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly) was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couctous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Army into Italy, so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren, who hauing once (if they could so do) finished the warre, might easily make Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulity, dulnes, or nigardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursements in Spain, than to set vp all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incursions of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had beene to make a running Warre, by

Of such ambition Hanno directly accused Hannibal, saying that he made warre that hee might liue compassed with Legions, as knowing no other way to make himselfe a King. Liue l. 1. c. 11.

Which the Romans might have bin found occupied, even vwith the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition therunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maijor intendment against Rome vntill such time as querey little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince, than must Emporia haue bin besieged and forced; vvhich by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gaue vnto the Romans at all times wheate they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the comie of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in balte: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians, hauing not aboue four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified, as great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Carthaginians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this town of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, liketo be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would haue bin a worke of little lesse difficulty, than vvas the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the course of the vvarre, which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborne, great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vnto out of Spain: vvhom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawn home to their own doores, by making strong vvar vpon their City. For euen so the Romans afterwards remoued Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seat of the vvar, transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is necessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not too their helping hands. Hanno vvas a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane vvhile they suffered Hannibal, & all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: vvhich all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted, as if the industry of those Barbarians had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their own Estate, few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their private intrest. But as they thriued little in the end, by their parsimony vied toward their own Mercenaries, vvhon the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this vvar present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal after the victory at Canna; vvhon gladly they vould giue all their Treasures, to redeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spain.

That both the Spanish business, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italy, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Gouvernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not rephend, in that worthy Historian Lince, the tender loue of his own Country, vvhich made him giue credit vnto Fabius & others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleue those lies, which the vnparell iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers, that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntuth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He faith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former vvar, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken wih many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrary herunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Emilius Probus, That Eryx vvas in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not bin any vvar. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberall. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catalus when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he vould not talke of any composition:

Amilcar boldly had bin shew whether he vould talke of it, or no; for that the Armenians, which his Country had put into his hands to vfe against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yield vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome vpon like shewings, were contented to let Amilcar haue his wil, & not to stand with him vpon point of honest, whilst otherwise they might quickly rid their hands of him: plaine enough it is, that they were faine from thinking him a man conformed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flarshly, & by name, charged Fabius with vntuth, saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, & his Souldiers, had endured such extremities, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were far from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman Age) & those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: vvhich take it in good part, that howsoeuer Lande introduced Hanno in one place, ioyning him foolishly his own shamefull overthrow at the Ilands, Egates, vwith the great Genius of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like euent, yet elsewhere he forsooke not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own happy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battaile at Samo, wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipios in Africk, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, vwith Val. Antias, & others of the like stamp, had bin written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the relation of Lince to his Romans had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations, which are such as follow.

XL

Reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar had sent thence his brother Hannibal into Italy.

It hath bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Italy into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, vwith foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had bin allotted vnto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal: who since he vvas marching into Italy with the strength of his Army, Lince beleued, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition, & therefore made bold to carry some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually preuailed in Spain, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we haue cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find meanes to repaire his forces, and retorne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the Carthaginian yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serue to arme the Naturals against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had reuoluted vnto the Romans; were it only by the memory of such ill success, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but in that Age, poor and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars, or serving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Lince. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Lince in his person, maketh an obidion, vnto Scipio, vvhich neither Scipio, nor Lince for him, doth doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and a little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italia. And it is indeede an incredible conceit, That Asdrubal being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of the talle, saue onely by the steepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great Rauer that lay in his backe, ran away with all his money, Elephants, & broken troups, ouer Tybris, directly towards the Pyrenes, and so toward Italy, vpon which he followed more than threethousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he should a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished, and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants along before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that cluie his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans, for so that they said to have done in the last battaile between him & Scipio from breaking into his Camps. Therefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and the uis, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdom to giue much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run ouer the doings of the Scipio in Spain, not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haueu towne, not farre within the Pyrene, retaining still the same name with little infection. That by the fame of his clemency, he allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vie his clemency, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and hauing no infection in the Country. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his demerity in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to haue none other end, than setting them at liberty. This pretext auailed with some: others were to be lured with money: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or feare, especially, when he had won a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alibi, neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. semper conseruent, which is, as Tullio interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeede an oblique couenaunt of infection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditiis Imine, of the Romane iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Burguntians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would makethem start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouvernour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Province between Iberu and the Pyrenes, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principality of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage, but tooke from them all Inferiour Officers of their own, leaving them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne, it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milans, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ran by seeking to auoid it. This bad affection of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio, wherein he was overthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wonne it.

It. Scipio Asdrubal having passed Iberu, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarraco, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, rousing abroad in the country; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, hee ranne vp into the Country, where he withdrew the Ibergetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where hauing set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himselfe againe ouer Iberu. So the Ibergetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Ahanagia their chiefe Cite, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Asinili likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their oblinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of Silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours, and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelue thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberu, hauing lately become voluntarily ditiis Romans, should vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Ibergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell, whilst himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberu. Philinus the Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal backe to his ships, whence he did not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginians returned into the leas of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio was gone, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Ibergetes, and the rest, wee may reasonably thinke, that they sought their owne benefit: helping themselves on while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon sense of injuries receiued, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to lie vnder their owne Country Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from henceforth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were neuer thoroughly conquered.

Lib. 18.

They were following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea, or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast, landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, about one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates, in Spain, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, or giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flie into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Luciania. Yet it followes, that the Ibergetes did againe rebell: that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberu, and that Scipio (though hauing only vanquished the Ibergetes) went not forth to meete him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subiects, and had giuen him Hostages. These hee sent from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes, where they slew fiftene thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then hee came to Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two becthen largely administrated the businesse in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian warre, the two Scipio, did band together, without both feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberu, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Asdrubal, after the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be persuaded by one Acadus, a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour of heavy goods will of the Country, was by freely restoring unto them their Hollage; and in giving them any pledge, assured of their faith. But the traitor Asdrubal, being troubled with the message & restitution of the Hollage, carried them all to the Roman Generals, & persuading them, as he had done Asdrubal, to make the Liberty their own; Holdfasting a Kanony purchased much longer, if the tale were true; & if it were not rather true, as afterward, and he this we find, that all the Spaniards were left in new Carthage. I am weary of relating to many particulars, whereof I can believe to few. But since we had no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The year following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipios divide their forces; Cn. makes war by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, having gotten four thousand foot, & five hundred horse, went to Asdrubal. He repairs his Fleet; and provides every way to make resistance. But his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, revolt unto the Kanony; because they had bin chidden the last year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Campanians, an inland people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These do much mischief; so that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they making head, so vainly assail him, that they drive him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe wrongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battaile. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and dispereth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage; that Asdrubal should leade his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do; if they had bin informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him; as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported; and that upon the very vtomour of this his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so; or, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to imploy they should find worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much-mooued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; Himiles, with such forces as are thought expedient for that service both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Whilest Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to win the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countreies he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he lays great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subjects; and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Spaniards, hearing these news; are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege him (so called of the River) name running by it the richest towne in all those quarters; that was confederate with Asdrubal: who the upon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home; than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slaine; and few should haue escaped; but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Camp the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionlesse they are maruellously enriched, in the money that could be raked together in Spain), being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes event ioyneth the Spaniards to the Romans; if any part of the Country stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of traicling into Italy, that he leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome; and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Coments are; That they haue neither money, nor bread, wherewith to furnish their Army and Fleet; That all is waiting, as it were, till they may be supplied from Asdrubal can neither hold their forces together, nor stay any longer in the Province. The Carthegians come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the late Cannae, to help it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent; how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inferred else where; into the relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipios pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke, that he should be the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistruied his own faetier? They find him, and Mago & Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of threescore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Strabo, and others, probably conclude to haue stood, where Carinena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illegetes their nearest Neighbours, for hauing revolted vnto the Romans. The towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through the Enemies Campes, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them; and haue thus assaulted the place, to encourage the towne-men to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should haue beheld them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threescore thousand; and killing more of the Illegetes, than themselves were in number, draue all the three Carthaginian Com- manders, & every one out of his quarter, and took that day, besides prisoners and other spoils, fiftie and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibilli, that stood but little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are slaine, as too greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But a way be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately striuen to poll the Country, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in this iourney, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battaile. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibilli: where there were of them about thirteen thousand slaine, and about three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Publius, Valerius, Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Lucius gaue credit, conquer all Spain twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories, whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are buerthrowne by him: P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is sent to make great haist ouer the River. At Carthrum alturn, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio in campe: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible, intending to make it his seate for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, & are gotten close; falling also vpon some stragglers, of such as lagged behind their fellows; so much, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behooufull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Publ. withdraws himselfe vnto Mons victoris, that lieth somewhat Eastward from Incibilli, ouer-looketh the Southerne Our-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His Brother Cn. repairs vnto him; & Asdrubal (the sonne of Gisco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie, they were incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himselfe to an high place of ground, where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Cassio, a great City of Spain, where Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans, though being late distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Bortis. Neuertheless the Carthaginians go on ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi again, wherein togeth a Rufian Garrison, hoping to win it by famine. We may iustly wonder, what should moueth them to neglect the rebellion of Cassio, yea, and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek to subuene further on that way; place, where they had been so grievously beaten.

the year before. But thither they goe, and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kils aboute twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doublelesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda, where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio bene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, & twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seuen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flee to Auriges; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kils not halfe so many of them, as before, good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entered into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Country once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they need not blush, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof vnto such of the poore disperfed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the country of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had been able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their braue exploits, we can perceiue none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourney; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Haven towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocæans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion; other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue won a town, whereof the Carthaginians held intire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they took Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise, which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like fort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after every one of which Asdrubal fate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Town to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriual of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in praesiding onely with the Celtiberians the next adioyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeers businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, That they haue yielded vnto themselves vnto the Romans, for securitie of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought, and not without expresse conuiction of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue;

you see; whilste perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, rather the custome of some bad Author whom I followe, to call every messenger, or stranger, that entered their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came, and would not permit him to depart, till he had paid his ransom. The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, sent an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the first were chosen, and sent into Italy, there to deale with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he bringe with him such news of the riches and victorie of Hannibals men, that all his followers at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall hear he is to be sent into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability; when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipios, pre-eminently this act of strength, divide their forces, and seek out the Enemies; who being met with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; euen among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good heed; but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed, the sonne of Gesal hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is but dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers; that is, two parts of the old Roman Army, leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer iourney to make, doubts somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesal are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They ioyne their forces together, meet with Publius Scipio, and lay at him so hardly, that he is faine to keepe himselfe close within his trenches: wherein he thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Asdrubals Prince of the Mallians, Numidians belonging vpon Mauritania; in the Region called now Tremizani to whom the chiefe part of this seruice is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilus Spanish Prince, commanding with seuen thousand & fiftie hundred of the Suesetani, to loyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilus vpon the way, leaving T. Pompeius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilus, but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appear (whom he thought to haue been ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men; where need most requiteth, is struck through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The second hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him, pretending that they had warre in their owne Country. If Anitorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Strabo takes it, a Celtiberian towne, this was no vaine pretence, but an apparant truth. We may iustly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them, and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the enemy, or to loyne with his brother, maketh a very violent retreat, herein only differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presses hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gesal, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispart his brother after him. Scipio steals from them all by night, and is ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested in an open place of hard stony ground, where growes not so much as a shrubbe; vntil for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of easie ascent on every side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weak defenses the Carthaginians bene too in sunders: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of the malice, and slaying themselves; I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape with Publius, whom Publius had left in his campe, as before said. It is terrible to thinke, that they say, out of which woman escaped Publius, how they that were thus decimated in on every every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could breake out, and throwd themselves within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away moode attention. T. Pontius is, in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull as may be supposed, of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a prettie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Pontius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Ashdrubal, the sonne of Gesio coming vpon them; this L. Martius so incourageh his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten but that he wisely founds the retrair, refering the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former security; and vnterly despising him, set neither Corps de gard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with lively words; and tels them, That there is no aduenture more safe, than that which is sure, in any desperate peece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and steales vpon the Campe of Ashdrubal: vvhether finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleep, or very drowzie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbines, and giues a terrible alarme, so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe, Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and run away toward the Campe of Ashdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay sixe miles off. But Martius hath way-led them. In a Valley betweene the two campes he hath bestowd a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse, so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his coming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied vvith their former execution, Hee driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seuen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Ashdrubal, there were slaine ten thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Linie therefore hath clew where vvell observed, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Linie reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Capitaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if vvith so small forces, and in such distresse, He could cleerly get off from the Enemies; & giue them any paring blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occursents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicerger in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued vvith the tidings, than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies leuied to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for the defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and vvell offended at his presumption in vsurping in a soe sacred well that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choise among themselves, for the best of that should command Armes and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius, Arrius was dispatched away, with all convenient haste into Spaine, carrying vvith him about fives thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines; vvith three hundred Roman horse, of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, & afforded meane of retiding abroad such a strong supply: othervvise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keep footing in Spaine, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing vvith his new forces, took charge of the remainder of the Army, which was vnder Martius and Pontius, he found stronger tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of those miraculose victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: vvhom how to reclaim, it would not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Ashdrubal the brother of Hannibal: vvhom he found among the Aufetani, neer enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides, vvithout of vvhielt there was no issue, but onely through a streight, vvhecon the Roman seized at his first coming. What should haue kept any man of vnderstanding, to incampe in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Ashdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vpp, made offer to depart forth vvith out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thetice dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertaing parlee vvith Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conueighed his footmen (a few at a time) through vvary difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a misty day, He stole away vvith all his Horse and Elephants, leauing his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Ashdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spaine; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, vvho hoped to conclud a bargain for so great a Country, vvith one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages, through vvhielt the footmen could hardly creepe out by night, the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke misty day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger vvhecon the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue been of far lesse value. Howeuer it was, neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recover the vvold vvhielt they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, vvhielt had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not vvell, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor vvhom they fancied not so vvell. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconful, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needfull to vvork regard in the Barbarians, and the beloued memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same family. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconful into Spaine.

This is that Scipio, vvho afterward transferred the warre into Africk: vvhere he happyly ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, & singularly vvell conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vvirtues that purchase loue, of vvhielt qualities vvhat great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that he reported of him, fauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity, How he vvould vvalk alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference vvith Iupiter; How a Dragon (vvhielt must haue been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed vvith his Mother, entering her Chamber often, & vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than fables, deuised by Historians, vvho thought thereby to adde vvnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not onely to haue surpassed other Nations in vvirtue of the generality, but also in great vvorth of one single man: To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently vvritten, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconfull was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face; no one of them hauing the heart, so to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the two partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconfull into Spaine; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Silanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinguereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporiz, and marched from thence to Tarracon along the Sea-coast. At the same of Scipio's arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a inaisie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly affraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleue this, then must we needs beleue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived theretogether with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue bene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles, whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-Iland, betwene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walles, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding some part thereof a shelve, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauiis, Scipio thrust therinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie, easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Linie himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk & Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Prouinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie, restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Here vpon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Illegetes & Lacetani, neere Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, & ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibila, King of the Illegetes, is much commended: for that he did not vaunt himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by iniuries of the Carthaginians, & inuited by the honourable dealing of

Scipio.

Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no vsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Illegetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio; then could nothing haue bin deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibila their King; excusing as new, his taking part with the same, when hee should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of Alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, & held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer masters of the Countrey, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won vnto himselfe the assured loue and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne coniecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth toward Italy; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, had done before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage ouer the Lake had bene vndiscovered, and the Towne held on some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the businesse, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Geis, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fauion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal, his Vancurers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drove them into their Trenches: and made it apparant, euen by that small peece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore-side; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly encamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betwene the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such advantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climbed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to die. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyreneces, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Geis, are reported after this, to haue consailed with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue bin true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

S. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumius the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans trying with the Aetolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WHe left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates reioyced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good news from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans come into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Armie; by making him Master of the open field. He might perhaps haue forced some walled townes; in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Caste of Canne: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill come were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may haue been the reason, why he forbore to adventure vpon Rome, after his victorie at Canne. For had he failed: (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carry the Citie at his first coming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprife. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battaile: if being, either for want of means to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vntill they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and truall was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer ioyfully, sauing that there came not any tydings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expedited. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had about thirty of them; whereas all, saue one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had bin lost in his journey through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourney, than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receiue the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He took the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Huetowne therabout, that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, he sent Himilco vnto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily & Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needs be deferred vnto another yeer. Hanno made an ill iourney of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him; as did all other places therabout, except onely the Towne of Rhegium, then against Sicily. The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good gouernment, vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earnest trade in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrary; they are to be considered, that they had lately contended with Rome for Souerainity, and were somewhat transported with ambition; which reason can hardly moderate, or beneuolently allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the public misfortunes had not so long continuance, to relieue their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed) as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a private iudicidion within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Whereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any releeue. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their owne safetie, as hauing already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths; and hauing striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparant probability, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloody victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assaults.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Canne, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumius, Albinus their Praetor they had sent, with an Armie of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian king Pinus they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subiect and Rebel, whom he had receiued: But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius, with all his Armie was cut in pieces by the Gauls; in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his coming, the Enemies had felled the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entered into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed. Men and Horses, in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of felling so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entered, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuce was subiect; I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue bene done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleaned, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy vessel, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse than the calamity. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted force to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Suerdulus Illyrian kings, as also with Geminus, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt vpon euery manner, entreating their assistance against Philip and Persens; not continuing their dutie, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For

Having assured his affaires in Greece, & enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a league; vpon these conditions: That the King in person should come into Italy; and with all his forces, by Land and Sea; to the Carthaginians in the Roman war; untill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoils therein to be gotten, should be left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, untill hee had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving seembably vnto him the full possession of that country, and the Iles adjoyning. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Princes, is lightly both controlled by the diuine Providence; which therein turned to his selfe, as Terence wisely termes it, and like an Antheus enuidous, or malicious, but very iust and iudiciall, in vp-holding that vnspokeable greater flo of Soueraignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassador that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, & aduertured vpon a bold lying. That they were sent from the King of Macedonia to Rome, there to make a league with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the Ioy thereofooke away all care of making better inquiry. So they were longly feasted, and freely furnished with guides that should leade them the way; and shew them how to amuse the Carthaginians: But they being thus instructed concerning their iourney, fell withally into the camp of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse; about which they came, vpon the points before remembred: In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnlooktly to be desired by the Roman flecte; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gaue them chase: They did their best to haue escaped; but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing bene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were nor able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Boslar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to finde all out: so that at length Hannibels owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadors and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves: Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedonia of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed; thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them, when their shoulders were ouer-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and sutable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beate vpon them from Spaine. They iudged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedonia, ioyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegiance, not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subiects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the City: it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twenty thousand Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italy, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling vpon Oricum; which he won, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirotes craued helpe of M. Valerius (or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order, but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip was then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand thousand men, vnder Nomius Grissus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. Thence made a notable sallie; and brake into Philip Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his campe, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his flect from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the River, so that he was faine to burn his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crowne of Macedonia; and easily perswaded them, being so affected, as hath else where bene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania; after which they had baped long, and whereof the Roman was as liberrall in making promise, as if already it had bin his owne. So a league was made betwene them: and afterward solemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitall. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Coryra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Country should be subdued, and left vnto the Ætolians, the pillage onely to be giuen to the Romans: And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should bee with Prouision, to hold no longer than whilst hee abstained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the onely point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalfe. That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vntill it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reserved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which reigned at Perigamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria; about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclosed to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Damachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Nauarre, was said to court the Maiors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when hee heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infect the kingdom of Macedonia, wasted the Countrie about Oricum & Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stir vp all the Greeks adioyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrie. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perseus, his son and heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him. Hee made a long iourney into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedonia, when the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere he should be able to returne. Hereto it much auailed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniade and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes conveniently situated to let in an Armie; and consigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) every Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other businesse); to succour these his friends, caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprife. When this Expedition was giuen over, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Ancyra; which they took: the Romans assailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne and the Romans the spoile.

For these good seruices M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Salpinius sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. Hee was chiefly moued by his owne ialousie house of Philip greatness: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrare; which honour, though he better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the fort of which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being loyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Herewith, these his noble some neighbours desired peace of him; and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable conditions; as ill becomed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the incouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis, which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip dwelt. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Nafpactus, wasted the country in a terrible brauery: wherein Philip requited them; committing vpon them in great hast from the Nemeian Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prusias King of Bithymia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Nautic into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reason, as being more interessed in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vse the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastening vpon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needfull that he should coere the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman garrison, which drate him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had given testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also sone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twenty thousand head of Cattail, which they had brought together into a place of safety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale betwene Attalus and the Romans, fore was in an uproare: and not only the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Country, but some Captains of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in the change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving but three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaians. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings, vpon whom he might shortly to retaine. The affaires of Macedonia his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill, fauourably especially in the Ile of Euboea, where one Plator betraied to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it: where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus: This Citie, lying ouer against Euboea, Attalus had wonne more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed: now because the Roman soldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens, the sudden ridings of Philip arrivall, made him come all behinde him, and ranne away to the Sea side, where he got aboard his ships, hiding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this misadventure, or tydings of Prusias the Bithymian his invasion vpon the kingdome of Pergamus, made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, wonne Torone, Tritonon, Drymon, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the meane season, Machinidas, the tyrant of Lacedamon, had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chooe two new Kings, and to conforme themselves to their old manner of government. But their Estate was so farr out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnsuccessfull, than had bene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose vp among them: vpon whom succeeded this Machinidas; & shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian & Roman side, for feare of the Achaians, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entering into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Country; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such hath they made, for feare of being overtake. But flight, hee saide, was not alwayes prosperous: hee should one day fight vpon them, as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, he fell vpon the Ætolians: whom hee drave into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Country. This done, he tooke leaue of the Achaians: and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subiects, or dependants: and animated them so well, that they rested carelesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leasure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, all neighbours to Macedonia: with whom neuer thelesse he was not so far occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make strong warre vpon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy: caused them to giue over the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Ætolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fise gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium, & Apollonia, making a great noise as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell; but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the wals of Apollonia, making some Occurrences of peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in euil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital; they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Aetolian Pyracies. Oneh once they came to his helpe, which was, as his last journey into Achaia: but they were gone againe before his arrival: hauling down nothing, and depending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at subliming as Philip, with his own hand, durst boldly passe by sea, and found none that durst oppose him: if his wisdom in dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue bin one of Hannibal's tricks, who took advantage so biterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to see that so great a King made offer to serve in person vnder Hannibal, and required the assistance of the King Hannibal as his man likely to make Monarchs, and to alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. There was he had reason, such as one could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and profitable warre: which was, not to aduice into the follow ship of their Italian warrs, to mighten a Prince, by whom change of situation might make dangerous to their Empire; on his much affection with Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberties. Rather they should doe well to saue changes: and face the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of lendings, and for a while to succour. This would cost nothing, yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans; & compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might hinder this Enemie work abroad. Should the Roman Armies be liued in Italy, and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be urged vnto the prosecution, by his own necessity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges, yea, (as to the labour of giving him thanks). Now, if it might cometo passe, at Hannibal's every day del promise, that Rome and all Italy should within a while be at the destruction of Carthage: better it were that the Cite should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might aduise their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betwixt them and the Macedonians; than that Hannibal, with the power of Africa, should walke vpon Philip, as his Executacioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse apprehensiu in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Quintus and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were comparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to this reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in their little comestic which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he began the building of an hundred Gallies; as if hee would let them and others know, where to his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to his false promises. When therefore the Aetolians had submitted themselves already; and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians; but a Patrone able to haue succoured them in their necessity, he might giue ouer the warre; and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselves: For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes; but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, that the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonians; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, by some what might serue to haue been gotten. On the other side, the Attinians were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Orghus probably conceiues) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia; then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue so peace, as they would seeme to haue don't; but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to the disadvantage.

The Confederates and Dependents of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were the King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, & Epirots. On the Roman side were named first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Ilium; then, Attalus king of Pergamus; Antiochus, an Illyrian Prince; & Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedaemona together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Aetolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Aetolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Achaens: they stood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treaty, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a buisie people, and admitted occasion to renew the warre, when means did better serue to follow it.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-wealth.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and waited more men and money to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the lesse harmful, if their care of Italy had bin such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yere to yere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Perithimus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Isle of Sicily; as also that warre, of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannae, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates, would vnterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yere, yet at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care, and required their seuerall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they sent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastic catching at Sicily: little deferred to bee thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather euery one of these Actions, considered a part by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were zealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; & to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumae, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be regarded for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great maruaile; his forces being then diuided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy: once, Naples was, euen in those dayes, a strong City, and required a yeres worke to haue taken it by force.

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get in, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the town of Canth they of Capua had their plot, & were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campanians) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue beene Posthumus Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being iudged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they fained so to haue done, because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the City about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Army, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campanians: not able to meete the Enemy in field; yet intuent to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaues, that lately had beene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, he continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skillfull in the exercises of warre, than to keepe it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum, the Senators of Cumæ sent him word of all that had passed betwene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cumæ: whence hee issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campanians. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfus the chief Magistrate of Capua, with foureteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surpris others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore suffering none to goe forth of Cumæ, that might heare word of him to the Enemy, issued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meate and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; losing not about a hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to risse it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde those young souldiers, and Slaues, busied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it; which they brought close vnto the walls, thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower: whence they made resistance; and found meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fire, the Romans, fallying out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Consul wisely somded the Rutæ, where his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in readiness to requite their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of his good successe, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, nere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Army was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of war: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall inuasion vpon the whole Countrey, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Himines and Sannites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal; as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul, when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and receiued there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraignty. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: wherby at once they ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old, the more easie meanes, to take teuchage of their defection.

The people of Rome were very inrentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus the Roman sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formality, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, & the great preparations which the Romans made, serued to put the Campanians in care, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong; and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein hee had very great intelligence. Whilest hee was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iourney against Beneuentum; and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about fouenteene thousand foot, Brutians & Lucans for the most part: besides twelue hundred horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moors. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceived to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late armed Slaues, had receiued from their Generall a peremptory denunciation, That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by imployment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne; if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard vpon the Romans battell, that foure thousand of the Slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly behaue themselves) retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Army was broken; being vnable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, hee was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had receiued

vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumitted) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama; being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feed their Townes and Armies, without any surplussage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italy, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as liuing vpon the same trade; and subiect to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil & Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the Pol, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolu'd vpon the onely course, without the which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to assembly: wherein Quintus Fuluius the Pretor laid open the publique wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuf, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours vntill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnderaken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had bene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intenued to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had bene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more, euen whosoeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vsed to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate,

Senate,

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serue vntill the end of the warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to chooſe or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vn honest or vnseemly behaviour fell nor within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publique Horles of seruice, vnto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rancke; or making them change their Tribe; or (vvhich was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moraltie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man inroached vpon the streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publike Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious vnto the Censors, which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming, Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with putting the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generositie of the Romans. They that had been accustomed, in more happy times, to vndertake such pieces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and trauell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had been enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euery one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quæstor kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the sustentance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilst the whole stocke was vsed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort perceived) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their country was in so great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians, nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commoditie, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, wherinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse, if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather inable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom she forthwith vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Romani mettall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to allies, and taken from euery particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersality. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimention or stamme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domestickall prosperity is laid aside; and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath seen a great example, in the vniited Prouinces in the Netherlands, whose present riches and and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme indutric, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasuries, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and about all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautifull, should in all reason have been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleued their owne interest to be as great, in those vvarres which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue been throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subiect vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

As the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of indutric, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The towne of Casiline, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison; and likely to haue been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neithertheless the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue been vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearful, and craved parlee; offering to give it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fifte of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deferred commendations, by holding his vvorde good vnto these fifty, I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsam in Gascoigne taken by the Marshall Antonius, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition, the besieged ranne all from their severall guards, vpon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discouraging a part of the vvaile vnguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all saue the Gouvernour vnto the sword. Herein that Gouvernour of Mount Marsam committed two grosse crouris; the one, in that he gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance giuen and receiued. Some such over-sight, the Gouvernour of Casiline seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Antonius, was very honorable.

table. When this Worke was ended, many small townes of the Samnites, and some of the Lucians and Apulians, were recouered: whereof were taken, or slaine, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum, waiting to heare from those, that had promised to give vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propetor had thrust so many men into it, that the traitours durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian, was faine to depart, having vvaried himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he walked not the country, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his vvinning place; and began to victuall it, when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne, in which regard if he began his winter more timely, than otherwife he required, He did not like the Romans, whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to trauell vp & down the country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily, whether Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were P. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike seruice, to employ oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the vvarre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Licitors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe, which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Licitors to note it; who therupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feete. The father cheerfully did so, saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make trial; whether thou diddest understand thy selfe the Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that towne, (seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend) came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therfore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a patterne to all traitors; vsing him, as Candillus and Fabritius had done those, that offered their faithfull seruice against the Faliscis, and King Pyrrius. But P. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he should be sent to the towne of Cales; and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolve what to doe with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, took it not sorrowfully, but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might seeme rather seuerer, than courteous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wone by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibals Soldiers lay in the towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were trust for most by the Carthaginian Garrison, when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Soldiers held the town-men for sicke, and therefore thought it no wisdom, to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans, protesting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subiect to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proesse of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Consul, and receiuing his faith for security of the Town, presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to letue their campahions, and serue on the Roman side, it was yet couenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, & retorne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneus Fulvius; another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their seruice; vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their citie should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campanis toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentes also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would haue followed their example; but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in foraging the Countrey, was slaine by Hanno; with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, so which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe; & being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence, He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his will. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, vwho lay at Rome as Embassadour, prauiding with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But he and his company were the next day so dolefully pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, vwhere they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nice and Philemenes, two the chiefe among them, vfed much to goe forth of the towne on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue bene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourney to Tarentum, if he should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place: the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure. He caused it to be giuen out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order, He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot, and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare left he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered. It had bene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times: Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the euening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal guided by Philemenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall; Nice, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready: Presently Nice beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vpon the Porter, bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a wicket, so heauy, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket, and forthwith forthwith burst two yong men, laden with the Beare, which Hannibal had prepared long enough, to be worthy to look on. Which did so portend wondrous at the largeness of the beast; & Philemenes was a hunt through within his Boares, & being in some thirty armed men, fell vpon the watch, whom when he had slaine, he entered the gate, & so the gold of Hannibal, leauing the remainder of the watch, went quickly toward the other place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and so to the quarters of this Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides: They were commanded to kill all the Romans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better perswasion herof, Hannibal would thinke the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare: All the towne was in uproar, & so they could not haue the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnscilfully sounded by a Greek the Thracian: which heuened the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, & of the Romans, who were about to spy the towne, and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking board, got into the Sea, & so fled in the mouth of the Hauens; whence he might easily perueyue, & so morning, he was all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them word of stand, what good affluen: he bore them; inuenged bitterly against the Romans as tyrannous oppressors, & spake what else he thought fit for the pretor. This done, and having gotten such good pay as was to be had of the Soukiers goods in the Towne, he adressed himselfe against the Citadell, hoping that if the Garrison would lay out, he might give them such a blow as should make them vnable to defend the place. According to his expectation it partly did: for when he beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauery, & dallying, & so they charge vpon him: who fell backe of purpose according to direction; & when they had drawen on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure: Then Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for this purpose: & suddenly falling vpon the enemy, slaine him backe with great slaughter; as fast as he could turne; so that afterwards he durst not flie forth: The Citadell stood vpon a downy hill, that was plaine ground; and fortified onely with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawley. This cawley Hannibal intended to lay in like fort against the Citadell, to the end that the Tarentines might be without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger the next. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Place it selfe, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place; But while he was busied in his workes, there came by sea a strong supply from Metapontum, which took away all hope of procuring any more helpe to his former counsaile. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haue, and could not passe forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadell; it seemed likely, that the towne would suffer want, being debayted of accustomed trade, and provisions by Sea: whilst the Roman garrison, by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this indonuenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haue, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets long, & narrow, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land; and to throwe into the Sea without. This he vnderooke, and effected: wherby the Roman position was reduced into great necessity; though, with much patience it held out, and Hannibal often times otherwise busied, than his affaires required. At last, with mutual losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces growed daily stronger. L. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans now armed. This was a great and haffie growth from the want of men, and of all necessities, whereto the losse at Canne had reduced them. But as for the Tarentine Legions, they were faine to take vp yong Boyes, that were vnder sixteen years of age, and to send Commissioners about fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might be faine to be sold, and pressing them to the wars, making yet a Law; That, their yeeres of seruice, whereto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their beinge from this time beginninge to yong, as if they had bene of full age.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campani felt great want of victuall as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeers made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shortly. He gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victuall, that he would prouide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantitie of graine, that had been laid vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packe-horses; as if this had been enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesnesse of the Campani. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day, against which he made prouision to store them throughly. Of all these doinges word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night, where with diligence he made inquirie into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carts and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great haruest. Herevpon the Consul made his men prepare themselves to assaile the Enemies campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneuentum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By coming so vnexpected, he had well-neere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to lose more off his men in the attempt, seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie; and to lye betweene Hanno and home; that neither the Campani should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to sound the retreat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great boote; or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would indure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue fixe thousand; and taken, aboue fifteen thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie, and how he had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, whilst he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which hee saw in many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Gracia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the Citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies lye in their

Towns;

Towns, which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inuading to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neere at hand; against whom whilst they proffered their seruice to Mitius, the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little familiarity they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans, in saving Mitius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while, because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practice: whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disposition lasted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest, and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Beneuentum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Consul, was slaine, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambusc, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he felt vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or for the reports agree not by the Romans, to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the backs of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death happened in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that busines. The Volones or Slaues lately manumitted, forsook their labours, and went euery one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, and drawing neer to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Fulvius came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; insomuch that hee caused them to dislodge. They remoued by night, and went severall waies: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who hauing led him a great walke; fetched a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and he himselfe being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius, a Roman Pretor with eighteen thousand men, was in Apulia, very careless, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he hastened to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, vnder men of small ability. Coming vpon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambusc. Then offering battell to Fulvius, hee soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliuie; leauing all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, receiued the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuertheless, all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sat down before the towne, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should

haue his pardon, and be suffered to inioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was conuittellously reiected, the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourney, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. Thither the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither again, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the City; which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and thereby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered, and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, & to dispatch the election of new Magistrats in Rome; whilst he him selfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The towne-men often sallied out; rather in a brauery, than likelihood to vvorke any matter of effect, the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan hoise (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skitish. In these exercises the Campans vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy, who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and couragious young men, should learne to ride behind the Roman men at armes, leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemys hoise; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans; and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galaria, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnseruiceable people on the wals, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Bassons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; & so wel repressed them, that he draue them at length backe into their City. Neuertheles, in pursuing them to their gates. He received a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian army. The Roman camp was euen at point to haue bin lost; and Hannibal his Elephanes, of which he brought three & thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch, & filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assaults. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine wel, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it selfe: & now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had wel-neer lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue bin much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of waire that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces, then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman Camp, conuincing himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourney to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddennesse of his arriuall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Vulturius. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behouefull: & if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the city of Rome into much aduantage. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fiftene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Army: with which he hastened toward Rome, leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Vulturius, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hastened he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken down, by the people of Fregellæ: which as it stopped him a little on his vway; so it made him the more grieuouly to spoyle their lands, vvholes the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater wast he made: his Numidians running before him; druing the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie, some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with vvomen, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrats. All places of most importance were stuffed vvith souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon vvhich part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hastning to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the city in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arriued at Rome, one soone after another: Fulvius hauing been long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturius, and Hannibal receiving impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater, so took they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio, or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way vnder the walls, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen vpon some displeasures from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelue hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their seruice might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed to not from the followers of Hannibal, bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noyse was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cartell, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was stopp'd vpon: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not been certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battle to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vndertook it. It is said, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Camps: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking vp & clearing as soone as they were departed asunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not indure to stay there, until his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to waite his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipios, was sent out of the town, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Punic terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause knowne, or no cause answerable to the greatness of the sudden consternation: it is a good remedy to doe somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men haue fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his fouldiers to disarme themselves, vvhhen they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproare in his Army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Asse into the camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, & augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bin diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, vvhich clouded their valour at this first coming: than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bin in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made port-fall of the Siluer-smiths shoppes, vvhich were neer about the Market or Common place in Rome, as if his owne title to the houses vvhich in the Town were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, vvhich he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing vvorh. The Romans did seeke to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued, Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himself, this iourney had brought forth none other, than the same of his much daring. Wherefore he brake vp his Campe: and doing what spoil he could in the Roman Territories, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest ouer the Country, and ran toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrival was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gaue it to strand it likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hannu, which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie, since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

2. Fulvius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeeld, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conscience of his owne euill deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Belsar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey such Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was vnderaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne into the Roman camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conueigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Belsar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium & Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions whetsoeuer they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue we gotten those victories at Trebia, Trasymene, and Cannae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate fall, if he would once more adventure to set vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Belsar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hannu and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were beleaged in Capua, had bin sent ouer by the Hannonians, to obserue the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were so, iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessitie. Howsoeuer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeited fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Campans, so that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few years since had been most forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough wherunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemies sought vpon their bodies. About seuen and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open, whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian garrison; & commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all; and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet to hardly vied by Fulvius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersity. Ap. Glandius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexecutable to the Campans; as hauing loued them wel in former times, & hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pacumnus, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for feare, left vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proceed more gently, than he thought behouefull to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, & from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods, after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all to wnes of Italy the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campan; & bred a general inclination, to return vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatines, people of the Campan, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, & want of ability to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualtie. Where re liberty was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campan being detected by a slaue of their own (to whom, about his liberty promised, was giuen about the sum of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their defects. Fulvius hereby being more & more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their wals: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate, that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poor women in Capua (of which once had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day, and confined vnto seuerall places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious sit: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Prouost was euery yeer sent to gouerne¹⁰ ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre spent; and that which should haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicill, held warre against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

WHilst things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia & Sicill by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet & happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great & sudden: about thirty thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harsicoras with his son Hyostus, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better, if their care had bin directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italy; where¹⁰ on this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindred the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harsicoras with his followers might well enough haue serued to driue out Quintus Mutius the Prætor: who lay sicke in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But whilst they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise enterprise was such; as may seeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed, the Bold, with a competent fleet and armie, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Marga a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares: so beaten and in such euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and vp-hold in their seuerall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had bene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatsoeuer accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Considerour, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very carefull intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subiects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harsicoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: he landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemy. Hyostus, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This yong Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So he rashly aduencured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee received a terrible ouerthrow; and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyostus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troups, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to saue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance; their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius farth of Calaris: where if hee had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would haue sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius aduencured all to the hazard of a battaile; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thousand. Foure houres the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the sight of the Islanders, whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of yong Hyostus, and of his father Harsicoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space wonne the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded vnto the Roman; who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their seuerall offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome, leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicill was of greater length, and euery way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby, not onely sauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enioyed before. Soone after after the battell of Cannæ, the old king of Syracuse died, who had continued long a steadfast friend vnto the Romans, and greatly relieued them in this present warre. He left his kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successour, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he iudged most likely to preferue the kingdome, by the same art, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a litle while, Andronodorus waxing wearie of so many coadiutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and said, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands, which came to passe, in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernment, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diadem with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more hee offended them, when by his insolent behauiour, suitable to his outward pompe, he gaue prooffe, that in course of life, he would reuiue the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the pattered of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoide the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoeuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about the maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraso, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his person, was detected by a Groom of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vnder-takers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremities of the torture; he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neere in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streetes, and neuer shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremities. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found means to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessitie, had of late been such, as might haue bene termed excessiue, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking litle heed of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things present; the weaknesse of Rome; the preualent fortunes of Carthage; and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Cannæ, that he might thereby learne how to accomodate himselfe, saying, That he could hardly beleue the Carthaginians;

so wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reigne ouer all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his iourney, as much discouraged him when hee came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke bigger. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thanks, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (wherof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine-glorie, and send word after him, that he should consigne that money ouer to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his crime was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimity, into such a pitifull tune of thanksgiving, as must needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innoation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom wee spake before, were sent about the Countrey with two thousand men, to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing betweene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word so ioyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had litle courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers; with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp, the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcasse to lie vnburi'd. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signifie all that had passed, to stirre vp the people to libertie, and to preuent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to vsurpe a tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; between desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that wel-knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, still bee were halod out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But feare, and better counsaile preuailed so farre, that Andronodorus, hauing relied vpon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth; and made a speech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, lest they would not haue contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer, he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had bin an cuill master both to him and them. Hereupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraigntie, and so vehement were the instigations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicles, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicles had bene with the Syracusan Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilst he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusan Magistrats were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtisie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Scitilians, to be gone so hastily as they made heed; they were more mindefull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilst Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recovered those royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heauy sentence: but Heraclis, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sossippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash iudgement. Her husband Sossippus was a loue of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to king Ptolomie, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardonning themselves) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicles Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senarors approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, so that was lately come into Sicily, they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitives, & mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the

the league; & that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicles fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himselfe vnto the Leontines; whither he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be disfranchised by his death; as well as the Syracusians: yet of much rather all things considered, since in their Architects the Tyrant was slain; and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had bene subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should becometh the Subjects vnto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicles told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit oportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, whilst this crafty Cathaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene subdued by the same hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and bene subiect vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather reasonable, than iust. Neuertheless, the motion of Epicles was highly approved: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines; for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicles, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed; so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans; nor thought themselves bound to obserue the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, wherinto Hippocrates and Epicles fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueyed themselves into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing which Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains vsed after victory, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaues and renegadoes, whom he caused all to die: therof both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a reasonable sort. It was said, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusan Army vpon the way; as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were; that had bene sent forth of Syracuse; vnder Sassi and Dionankus; two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country; but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers as now they termed those against whom they went; had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and set them to worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their fortices. So towards Herbesus they marched; where they Hippocrates and Epicles, the Architects of all this mischief, deuising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakly accompanied; that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to thier offences past. Hercof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore deuised vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Olive branches in their hands; in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Cretes were in the Vanguard; that that had bene well vsed by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound vnto Hieronymus, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and kindly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them of good cheer, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could use their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rout out of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by lowerie, which would not serue. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in Irons, the exclamation was so violent against them, that faime they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara, wherethey were lodged the night before. Tither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick, whereby to help himselfe, and better the viceraine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretians, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusan Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that he farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the uproare was such, that Sofis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and flee for their liues. All the Syracusians remaining behinde, had bene cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saved their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued among the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witness. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (saide some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected; who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might haue bene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilst they were thus discouraging, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vncle for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all slaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he nere with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, Their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enioy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might bee deliuered vp. Hereto Epichides briefly answered, That if their errand had bene to him, hee could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when choise whom they were sent, had the gouernment in their hands. As for the warre which they threatened, he told them, they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse, was another manner of worke, than to take Leontium: Thus hee sent them gone, and returned backe into the City. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or rour in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defenders, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there was at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder, had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remooue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is; if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For prooue of this bold assertion; he performed some strange workes, which made the King entreat him to conuict his studie vnto things of vse: that might preferue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done vnto the liberrall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handi-craftsmen. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath bene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit, and things, that every one could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent prooue. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuention any whit the lesse, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may bee said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes, which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wisemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauels of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere Strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections; it is in some such case as this; and stretch against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath bestowed vnto them. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Summe to lye vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitabill knowledge hath not amixed to it some dangerous cunning, that may bee perturbed by euill mento a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Art, were contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecoverable poison; much better it were, that such a ieuell remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man, than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse, not for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he together publish the knowledge, how to vse them; but referred to much to his owne direction;

direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approoued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these Archimedes had sundrie deuices, of which any one sort might haue repelled the assaylants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heauy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yeards of ships, which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast vpon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In the like fort was the Land armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like haile, did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get nere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanche, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond vp hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaylants liues: For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engins were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare, against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engins had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; hee might haue holpen it, by some deuice, to make them vnseruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haven, the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likelie so soone to bee consumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicill, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so deak with the Senate, that five and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicill by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbesum, which yeilded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it; either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrigentum: whether he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse, carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumstance, that he vied, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foote, and five hundred horse, horse, intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the disperd and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a litle to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long; ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, charged with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse; and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed to againe; that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco; and safely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians, and slew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation; if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to preuaile: & he himself was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not feisible, an enterprize that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaid to preuaile by treason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to praefice with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a flauie vnto one of these banished men; making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse, where hee talked in priuate with some few, as hee had bene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to send him aduertisements of their proceedings, by a slisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Locrean, that had bene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon; was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epistides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose; not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometric, fell to measuring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had bene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus; who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surpris. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was beheld vnto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheate was not so plentifull, within the Citie, as in former times, Epistides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiual night, came vnto the walls, which he took by Syracuse was diuided into four parts (or five, if Epistides were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some prizes; he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those that were sheltered vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnarmied of his hope; since they held out a good while; and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues and Renegado's, were more careful than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himiles, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himiles came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicides sallied out of Acradina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as strictly besieged, as hee himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countrie seruice; but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loth to double the Cape, for that the windes did better serue the enimie than him. Thither sailed Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, hee stood off into the deepe, and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Stell farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Aggrigentum: where he expected the issue, with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian souldiers that remained aloue of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could safely, vnto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicily was giuen as desperately by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Heere vnto Marcellus willingly gaue eare: for hee had staid there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death, new Pretors chosen, and the gates euen ready to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercenarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Armes, and fell vpon the new chosen Pretors; whom they slue, and made election of sixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers, excepting onely the fugitiues. The Treatie was therefore againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) prooofe of the Roman auarice in the sack of Epipola, Tyrie, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vse the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the sixe Captaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as visually is found in Mercenaries, holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: hauing a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanishe Captaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors, to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approued at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister

vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yield vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the sight of Epicides: it had bene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascallie, and some ill aduised persons, ioyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken: Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargaine vnder-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good vylage in time to come; than to restore the boote, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthy strong, and many wayes important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill neighbours; and by that very forme of policie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly affirme, That it received no small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all foreign enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthie Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the iealousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his historie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make in iustice the more excusable: vnlesse we should approue the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to haue stolen a siluer cup from a sicke man, said, Hic non inueni laus drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse; wherein the booty that it found, was said to haue bin no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; save onely the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that hee hearkened not to the noyse, and vprore in the Citie; no; nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which hee first found out. An Invention of so little vse, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the deuising of all those engins, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many as one would thinke the monie lost, that had bin spent vpon a sonne, whose studies in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit; as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicily yielded vnto the Romans, except Agathinum and a few places therabout. At Aggrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an Affrican, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more vallant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans; where they lay encamped; and droue them fearfully into their Frenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that hauing bene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that hee had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, likeas good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside vnto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enimie, vntill his returne. So much therefore thereafter would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse; as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betwene the two Armies; farre greater were the odds betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreiman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had bene misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did softly set vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agigentum.

If Hanno could haue bene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was better man of Warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly haue bene reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince, and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very haينously, that no good seruice done, could bring so them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, & not suffered to return back to Rome with their general. Mutines had pacified his Countreimen the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what hee could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately overthrowne had bene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Pretor, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled; and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country, yet hee hindered the Country from reuolting vnto Mutines. About three score Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as hee pleased; in despite of the Romans: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuy, against the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honours of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should haue bene regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spitefull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreiman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lavinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the way in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agigentum, and to helpe to expell them vnto the other side of Sicil. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needefull, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had bene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had bene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a smal Barke, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans; that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Lavinus the Consul hauing taken Agigentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time; wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may haue bene the reason, why Lavinus dealt so cruelly with the Agigentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependents of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twenty were deliuered vp by Treason; and fixe onely stayed to be wonne by force. These things done, Lavinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of out-laws, bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their iournie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue bene employed in Italie: leaving yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betwene the Romans and Hannibal in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metanurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicil, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. He staid not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consul together with M. Valerius Lavinus, who succeeded him in the government of Sicil, and so was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers wherunto they had put him: willing them to be mooue themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessities; and not vnto the the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath beene shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Laenius, were appointed to make waire, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie, the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil fell vnto Marcellus; which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindered by feare, from uttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, he gently vnderooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countrey in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicil, whose doings there haue beene already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre, and most of all, with getting Marriners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer sort, that vsed to be employed in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be let out at the expence of priuate men; who in this necessitie of the State, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could vndergoe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty haue beene imposed vpon it. Neuerthelesse it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasurie was so emptie, the people must be forced, by right wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persuasions would be so effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow; the Consuls, likewise, that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoever; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vse, and those of a small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalties refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessity could no otherwise be holpen; euery one was contented, that his priuate estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wracke, in vain: could any particular man hope to enioy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deserved well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal; and Laenius toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua; which gaue them cause, to looke vnto themselves, as if in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in neede. This he well perceiued, yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must haue Garrisoned into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminished his armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or els he must leaue them to their owne fidelity, which now began to wauer. At length his ialousie grew so outrageous, that he sacked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend; thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe, and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before hee had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yielded vnto Marcellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, than the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dafnus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafnus in priuate; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuicted and charged of Treason, hee so stoutly denied it; and by way of rectification, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuiled out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such liuely reasons; that he who could not be beleeued by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once; but was faine to catch aduantages, where hee might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie to follow businesse of far lesse importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply that had beene so long promised & expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might haue beene stricken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Cannae. But since that which is past cannot be amended, Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masaniissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spainne: whither when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iourne into Italie, of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best, the Romans to prevent the threatening mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor, lay neere vnto Herdonia to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since, neere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonia ere Fulvius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor, who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himselfe, with twelue Tribunes or Cornels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting seuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonia, because it was at point to haue yielded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude, whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this; wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheere; for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouertaking him at Numistro in the Countrey of the Lucans, fought with him a battell, which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted vntill night, and ended, by reason of the darkenesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia; whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often, and sought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fabius, hee that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe

Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannasinum, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the coming of Adrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hor-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet, vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile, wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes, and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had bene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratagems. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did to vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall, they besought him to pardon them; and lead them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might beate Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motives continued the same, and his men had bene harted by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt. The second night, vnto eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late beaten ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal, who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Fabius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Vulscientes, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fabius encircled in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had bene authours, or busied in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Lanius had lately brought from Apurerna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, sat downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine which; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, he gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side: by telling him how rich; and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes; and said, that if the Brutian were faire in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistis, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne persuasions; partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; willed him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it, the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and brake open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vied now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of hospitality that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue bene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting, he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a litle while, and then they yielded. When this businesse was done, he hastied away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue also taken Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul, he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, be thought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgiue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, testified the superstitious Roman; the iourney to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; saue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so bene rid of them. But their common poverity, & disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered, that the Legions of Canna, and those vnhappy Companies that had bene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily, where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vpon the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had bene exhausted with leues of men, and impositions of money: in euery of which yeeres they had received some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrinum, Sikla, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope; as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disability of giuing any farther helpe, they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campanians or Tarentines, but the offspring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eightene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls, that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deserting.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate success. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasure; and thence take out the gold that had been layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consull, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to provide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liuie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spain, though he came not into Italy vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cume and Nepes, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good hauein, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy; where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonians, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had beene expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countreys his brother, was to passe; that therein he might make a partie against the Romans; The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from harkening to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Romans, & the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italy, did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consull into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were devising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terrour of seuerer iudgements & inquisitions, and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and took many hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consullship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy; and brought thither all sorts of engines, sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the city: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, & retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no need to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, & fought to take them at some advantage; reserving his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but fought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, wherinto the Romans fell: and hauing lost about three thousand of their company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay betwene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-growne with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscovered, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remove their campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neerer enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gaue warning of their approach to his fellows, who discovered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls & their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consull, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts, and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe. The rest of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Ligors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead body of the Consull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, couered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was false into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring; wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needfull. The deuice was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengfull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians herupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate: for the Consul was there. The gate was opened faire and leisurly, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laide at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; where vnto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantecours, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Common-wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neere vnto the enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staid wit. The fathers therefore endeauoured to ioine vnto him in the Consulship M. Linius: one that had borne the same Office long before. This M. Linius had bene Consul with L. Emilius Paulus, in the yeere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them bene called into iudgement by the People: and this Linius condemned; Emilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once already noted, yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Cannae, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Emilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Linius, hee is euen now ready, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had he bene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrey Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Linius, being Consuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his carelesnesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire & beard, which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vsed to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formall words, or in passing from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman; he stood vp, & made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Linius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not vsed in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician; the other, of necessitie a Plebeian; and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lanius, being both of them Patricians, could be ioyned with Claudius Nero: euerie one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Linius. But Linius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phraises he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested iniuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men breake in faire weater; but run vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulness, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duke to prison; vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans vsed at this time the seruice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leaue and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italy, where need seemed to require; that onely two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the panchall obseruance of what the Senatethought fit. M. Linius would not stirre out of Rome; against so mighty a power as followed Asdrubal, vntill he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could wel be spared from other employments; and those, by the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lusius Porcius a Pretor of that yeere; among the Cisalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Linius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines; neere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was sent against Hannibal. Neuertheless the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Linius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwell in the Countrey about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioine with him; and L. Porcius sent word; that he would adventure no further, than hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each his severall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had bene, when L. Aemilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare, lest all diligence, wilddome and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not bene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreame difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Cannæ: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the war in Italy. But there was now arriued another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riueres and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplyed his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, defended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, fare greater than he came ouer the Pyrenæes at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a pensue traine of Mourners: so thinking vpon Marcus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like sort they had given attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them returne aliue, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Minius, that hee should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniuelt Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iourney into Italy; such mention hath already bene made, as agreed with the report³⁰ of that noble Historian Lince. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the city of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courtes vndertaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those booke, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs re-⁴⁰ maining onely a few broken peeces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicill with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needefull, by these mischieuous Partizans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheless Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His iourney into Italy being resolu-⁵⁰ ed vpon: hee lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the Mines of siluer; whence he was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Capitaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue bene so great, as it must haue bene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staid be-⁶⁰ hinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him; and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenæes: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Geso; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Eaine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourney, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenæes (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his mony, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrey, whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iour-¹⁰ ney ouer the Alps, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauielled through their Countrey. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily per-²⁰ suaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattails, and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proceesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mighty Cities, farre dis-ioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly con-³⁰ descended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also ioy-⁴⁰ ned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arriued in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Armie neere, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so-⁵⁰ timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be ta-⁶⁰ ken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginians; & had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Abulians, into the countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the iourney intended. After-¹⁰ ward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans, he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to returne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assailed againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Aus-²⁰ tidus to Canusium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtain-³⁰ ed his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had⁴⁰ gotten in the same open Countrey. If this had so falne out; Rome would haue bene v-⁵⁰ done for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victo-⁶⁰ ry, in the naked Camps about Cannæ; if such an Armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beate him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of

Asdrubal

Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted; as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia and drew on wards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Linus the Consul. Of these newes Claudio Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howsoeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie, yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonels had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himselfe, to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choise of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some finall piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessities for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sua Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his journey thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his coming. Linus thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemy, perceiving this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done; and a token giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioyned with them on the way. Neweithelss, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few dayes after their weary iourney, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vndertaken, without this their coming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generals pavilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it; and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iourney. Hereupon he began to with-draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom hee might be certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The camp, as hath beene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the the quarter of Linus the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, Asdrubal was at a loss, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture; but thought it the best way, to goe cautiously to worke, till he might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-Strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuier Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Forde; or whether his charriges were too heauy, and hindered his speed: farre he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouertaken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in vvhom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe with his Africans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left, and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceit, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans, by whom he was so sharply entertained; that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the maner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudio Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules, that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces, and led them round behind the forces of Porcius and Linus: vvhich hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here began the victory to bee manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal's battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken alive: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons, others by their owne guides that rode them. For vvhany any of them, being fore wounded, began to vvaixe vnruly, and rush back vpon their own battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke between the eares, in the ioynt of the neck; next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them; is said to haue been the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe, vvhom dyed in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linus. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother: to haue striven with great patience, against many difficulties; wherinto hee fell.

fell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; so have performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when he saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting brauely, he was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Linie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannas; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were slaine, fise thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and about foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand; and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not onely in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the bootie, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to haue been as rich as Linie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well-stored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a parallel vnto that of Cannas) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to haue bin slaine. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aliue; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme that they were all Barchines: foras much as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their country, aboue their liues.

The ioy of this victory was no lesse in Rome, than had been the feare of the enemy. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Army; the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great aduenture, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chauce to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Army that staid behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall: Thus did they talke; yet reseruing their censure vnto the successe, with liberty to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market-places, the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready at hand vpon the Magistrates, as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleue it. Afterwards, when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italy.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoeuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Common-weale; yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolency of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deep impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperity. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks; Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brutians: and thither he caused all the Lucans that were of his parti to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compasse in the vtmost corner of Italy; being a countrey of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans & Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Linus the other Consul taried among the Cisalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Prouince, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leaue to returne home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as he well deserued. But foras much as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victory: order was giuen, that not onely Linie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero, though leauing his Armie behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Linie made the greater heere, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Petrus Philo, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgment of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this year, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy: save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surpris. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him, that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alonely they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius, vvhom Linie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greeks; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Linie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill he be drawne into Africa by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, took vpon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Annibal departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Balcares, there to leaue a supply of men;

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) vvhither the Romans had ill meanes to follow: being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: vvhether he met with one Hanno; the same perhaps that had lately bin employed in Sicily who brought new forces out of Africk, & came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlike-ly that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilcar, vvhose authority had been great-est, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriours; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some fuch opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by mony, and other perswasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: atten-tiue, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and six hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitiue Cel-tiberians, who became his guides, that their Countreymen incamped apart from the Car-thaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neer to these Celtiberians: & falling vpon them on the sudden, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, in stead of heartening & re-inforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago saued himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celibe-rians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherin Italy stood, by the coming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hun-dred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countreie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon re-mained at new Carthage, intente to the necessity and successe of his Countreymen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long be-fore the end of the Summer, then might he well aduenture, to take in hand the intire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had bin sent ouer into Africke, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noyced abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Ro-mans; and that Hannibal with his Army was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conformance themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italy, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because he took not this great enterprize in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vsed the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the Enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by assault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeers danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor trouble, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With fiftie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I beleue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly deny-ing the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore he iudged it needfull to vse the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast a-way by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Calscher, that was Lord of eight and twenty towns, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and six hundred horse for his seruice: he resolved to make vse of those, and some few others, that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not be able to doe any great harme, if they would revolt. So with six and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy, neer vnto whom he incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masaniissa fell vpon him; vvhith hope to take him vnprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But he layde certain troups of horse in court: which breaking vpon them vnexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly be-tookethemselues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any far-ther. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the euening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at some distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before designed. But Scipio when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traîne out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vsing therein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilst he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not bee discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat vnto their foote; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemie. But about noone he caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leauing their battaile of Spaniards far behinde them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, saue only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resi-stance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was comming against them, though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arriued, he should haue found himselfe in-closed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Cannæ. Wherefore he did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In pro-cess of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others began to faint with trauell and heate of the day.

Where;

Wherefore perceiving their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly : and gaue not ouer, till they had forced the enemy to change his pace, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderly retreat ; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them : neither was it ealie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, ledde by the obdurate passion of feare, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day bene taken ; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men : but caused them, hungry, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Atanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yielded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, & ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that 30 they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seuen thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessities to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one ; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence ; he tooke shipping, and fet saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllauus with ten thousand foot, & a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masaniissa staid in it) whilst he with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masaniissa 30 followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe ; some flying ouer to the Romans, others taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Towns left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans: of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison, consisting of such as had saued themselves by flight in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that citie. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death 40 of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not onely rebelled, but with great cruelty betraied and slue, the poor men that escaped thither from the ouerthrows. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians ; and, which was worse, had thriven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeer) Scipio went against these, and took himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo by treason of one Cerdanbellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: wherein was throwne all the gold, and siluer, with what fouer else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard, that should kill and burne 50 them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made, all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman camp; where struing beyond their power, they were euery one slauie. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it : & many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilst they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leauing Mago behind him, to wait vpon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax, king of the Massili, a people of the Numidians, hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the kings Port: who landing at the same time, caried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forthwith betinke himselfe, how to finish the war, by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much auailable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cm. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Capitaine into Africk; vho instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent 10 Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the vvar, which he intended in Africk, vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelius his Embassador, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the king to take part with those that had the better, and vvere without question his better friends. Onely Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should 20 visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended, thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea: and arriued in the kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would haue been very dangerous to him, had he been descried by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud, seeing at one time, two such Capitaines of two most powerful citie, came to desire his friendship. He would haue brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by vwant of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together : and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Couenant ; which in time of 30 performance, he as readily brake.

¶ II.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell betwene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath bene said before. The Conquest of the Countrey being then in a manner at an end, he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharp, according 10 to the maner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vsed in the citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue prooffe in single combat, of the valour that was in their seuerall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could nor, or would not other wise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbui and Orfus, 20 Cosen-germans: that contended for the principalltie of a Town called Ibes. Corbui was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the maner of our Irish Tanistry. But the father of Orfus stood lately seized of the Principallty: which though himselfe receiued by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe backe, but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered preempriorly, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell, and that neither God, nor Man, but onely Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills : and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the 30 foolc-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats haue bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Thesus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betweene Paris and Meneleus; the other, betweene Hector and Alex. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes; whereof that betweene David and Goliath; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelue of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curatii that were Albans. The combat of Maulius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauery. In England there was a great Combat fought betweene Edmond Ironside, and Cannus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdom. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys contending for the Duchie of Britain; there was a fight, for honor of the Nations, betweene thirty of the Britons, & thirty English: two of which English, were Calerie a braue Capitaine; and that Sir Robert Kneller, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warre, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Kneller is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue been combats of brauery, and of gayety of heart, as the French terme it; for honour of seuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses, or whatsoever else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life, or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betweene Corbis and Orsus. Vnto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betweene David and Goliath, or that betweene the Horatii and Curatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Henrie of Boulainbrook Duke of Hereford, & Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ashley and one Catling-ton: whom Ashley charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also, betweene a Nauarrois, & one Welch of Grimsby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if hee bee vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proued; I cannot affirme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or according to the customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be ouercome, Hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to doe, in the reigne of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauery; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeite hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when as any man hath had an hard and vnjust iudgement, saying, That he was tryed by the Law of Loray, or Berne; qu'il bastin paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaille, that great learned man Thomas Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, & specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Herbert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of these Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kinde of triall, was retrenched by S. Lewis, and Philip the faire, so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the king himselfe. It hath since been granted; though more sparingly, by the French kings, as to the Lord of Carrouges against Jacques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his countyman: wherein Sir Henry Kneller, Father of the Lord Kneller now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chab. Now in those challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those onely the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ses defences per uoe dementir. The defendunt was bound to plead not guilty, by raising the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did faiblement confesser le crime, silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French king, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euery petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie morallitic selfe; holding it a matter of no small glory, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fifth had patiently indured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obiection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe to many Duels, as are founded vpon mere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats, the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnparadonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their king, is grown to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kind of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slaue, the other, to a Souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my owne part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them, vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsely. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworne to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not break their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Liers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth, hath deadely lyed to him, to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the proffession of loue, that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vsed in their ordinary complements, and in effect to euery man whom they bid but good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) une marche & complot fait ensemble se mouquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres: A kinde of merchandise, and complot made among them, to mocke, belye, and deride each other: and so farre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vse, as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise, and those which men vse out of cowardise & feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; & vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I say, That whosoever giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied; doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promisseth any thing; tels him; to whom he hath promised, that he will performe it; and, in not performing it, hee hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knowes to that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine; and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreame rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his preiudice against whom the vntruth is vttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to be ciuillized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourses fauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to feare God or hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand seuen-penies men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitudo is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martiryum pona: sic nec fortem pugnans, sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as hee may iustly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe wee indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the iniurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animasq; in vulnere pœnere; And to arowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honors, being prest with injuries? I say that I doe not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law; and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the assaillant. You will secondly aske me, Whether a Noble man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer, that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror, and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, & a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the kings of England & other Christian kings, haue seldome taken any such advantage ouer men of quality, who vpon euery termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the king, to approue themselves by battaile and publike combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cur-purse or other Theeues: Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: Yet is not the Manslaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denyed; and he further saith (for I vse his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-slaier) be conuicted either by great Assize or by Battaille, vpon that appeale; the Man-slaier shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble men and Gentle men shall be repaid in honour, when an enemy taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamy vnseparable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, & children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may be felony, to take by violence euery thing which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues vnto the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may bee murder? But yet againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to bee much more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of history, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is employed and trusted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the law of God, and of all Christian kings: neither is it difficult, because euery equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrary; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame & reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine injury by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong vnto whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that giues ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduilement, hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to those that are ferule, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons, the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, (who struck M. de Plessis like a Ruffian coming behind him, and hauing the aduantage of company and his horses ready, shifted himselfe away on the sudden, but being afterwards taken, was so to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner:) or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iust cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgaue him: let any wise man iudge. To this if it bee said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when hee is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shameful, because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride petty iniuries or sudden iniuries, than are not offered from malice fore-thought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their own valor, and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scorneth to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our felues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our felues in all controversies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere, was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth bonnie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of feuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God vpon supreme Gouvernours, than the permission.

His Maiesty therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeoured, hath done to a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in beating down, and extinguishing, that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud, a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and kingly power, for euermore. And wee haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall bee no lesse happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanity of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must bee added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe & vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their feuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lyes; and such pernicious lyes, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euery weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile, and lying in wait for blood, priuily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the kings Maiesty now reigning, haue giuen notable testimony of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances, whoobing of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Marie, vpon a noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiesty, vpon a Baron of Scotland, whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artificans, euery age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Elbars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mourir Montaignu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fus il fut pendu & estranglé; who caused Montaignu great Master of France to die, to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elbars worshipped as his idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soon after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion; practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly defended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marcellis against the Emperour, gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike trial. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges; vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King, wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falshood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquiere) dont l'age pour deuener sages en soy, & ne laisser fléchir sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imagination faueur, qui pour fin deieu le submerger; A faire leçon to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waves of imagination faueur, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vnderfenced, That he was tryed, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

The last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sicke, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ran currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandanin and Indibilis, pettie kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take arms against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suesetani and Sederani, Confederates of the Roman; and wasted their Countrey. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with the spoile of the Countrey. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driuing away their Colonels, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vmber, to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilst they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent vnto them from their Generall; who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further

ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserved. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albius and Atrius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to assembly; and having them vnarmed as they were, encircled them by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inueighed against them all, as Traitors. This done, Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake, where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome to toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued euery man his pay when hee was free.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to bee quiet; but by the severity vsed to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof he fought with them; and sending Lalius with all his horse to fetch a compasse about the Hills, & charge them in reare, he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preferre themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio; and humbly craving pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes than formerly they had bene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades; and was met on the way by Masaniissa; who fearefully promised to doe him all seruice, if the people of Rome would send him to make war in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gaules, and Ligurians, to ioyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent vnto him from Carthage; & he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Town of Gades, without sparing either priuate men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthage; hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned backe to purpose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him againe to enter into their City. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein; and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome, he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bin granted vnto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consullship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voyce of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus, ioynd with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

Scipio obtains leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniissa who was ioynd with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consullship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should bee allowed, to bestow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spaine into the treasury; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make; which hee was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuiue the memory of his victories already gotten, and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassadors saile much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deferuedly, saying, That they were the most happy of all their countymen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carry home such ioyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans had well deserved. Neuerthelesse, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince; there wanted not many, euen of the principal men, that vehemently opposed him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemed to haue bene troubled with that dislike, which too often causeth men renowned for long approved vertue, to looke askint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were; That the treasure was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother; that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul, which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voyage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Asdrubal to passe into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeer a Prouince: which the Consul neuerthelesse propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with leues made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprife; he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much alteration there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogance, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure, whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicill might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the suddaine from the Balcares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore he was driuen to make choyce of his his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories, & made the ynsteady Gaule, ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to bee employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disabill him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartening him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which hee found, and that fatall voyage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bin pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lucina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punique, and Greek letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present; and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, catching both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse; which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was mutually empouerished by this warre; and had already tried the vniuersal way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make preffe of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he ouer-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vniuersally found in Councells of estate, so that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fabius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, hee had from diuers parts of Italy about seuen thousand Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmes, and Spears of all kinds: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford.

Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of five and fortie dayes, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanced twentie Triremes, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Armie into Sicill. In Sicill he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heavy censure. They had serued vnder Marcus and Lucius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vse to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Arms, as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. While he was providing, to haue things in a readinesse for Africk, the banished Locrians, that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, wherby they hoped to recouer their City. Some handicraft-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Towne, being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ranomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surpris'd. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craved helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Town-men were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio other Cittadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: was the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: laying, that the like had neuer bene committed, without notorious reuenge. By her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good care to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with orders: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharpe inuention that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idly in Sicill, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicill, together with the Pretor appointed for that Island; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Aediles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all, was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his iourney, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Laelius in Africk; rather to make discovery, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great bootie: and stricke no little terror into the Carthaginians, who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his iourney was, That speaking with Masaniassa, hee well informed himselfe of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniassa his reuolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuius doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuius, if it had been true: vnlesse we should beleue, that he vnwisely forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Ashurban, the sonne of Gesco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Siphax and Masaniassa loved. Masaniassa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Ashurban to be his sonne-in-law,

Which

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleuee Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that howsoeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax; yet since this their couenent proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wise dome to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Linie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his workes remaining) Linie did follow, it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crowne descended by order of the Countrey, vnto Desfalces the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly dyed: and his elder sonne, who took possession of the kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector ouer the younger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: Hee, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Syphax. The Carthaginians in reason would haue beene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not beene guiltie of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed vnlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice towards his Corriual, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheless Masanissa still retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained strong enough, to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though hee was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. Hetherfore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrey, euen as far as to Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the inuasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was repofed more hope of good successe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Masanissa; sent an Embassage into Sicill about the same time, which was little pleasing vnto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians, adding, That he could not choose but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloued wiuens Countrey, if it were inuaded. Neuertheless he promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans & Carthaginians held war abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little aduanced his enterprize; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Lest therefore the fayling of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way to preuent all discourse, and set the warre vndertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Hauing sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, said he, Masanissa hath benee with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to mee; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will prouide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by carrying any longer. This fine could not permit all further inquisition, that might else haue benee made, concerning the messenger these Embassadors, whose followers had benee scene walking vp and downe Syracus. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybaeum: and requesting by letters Masanissa that was Pretor in Sicill, to meet him there; halted thither with his Armie. Lilybaeum he agreed with the Pretor, about the diuision of the Legions between them; which to haue behinde for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning, onely ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to foue and thirty thousand horse and foot. Concerning his directions from embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe; since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Linie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, neere to a fore-land then called the faire Promontorie; which how late it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercure, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriual, helpe to confirme the opinion of Xylander; who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue beene the same; that was also called Mercuries Cape; since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorabile impediment soon after his arriual, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the Riuer Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo, whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proposed; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roned about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before hee had met with Lelius at Hippo; that was farther off, as it would haue benee for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouercome the trouble of a long Iourney, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica, by Land; when he might haue disembarked neerer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a coniecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybaeum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustentance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified vnto Lelius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoeuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to bee such, as not onely suited to inuade the lands of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might he better aduise them to set sayle for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuiued, or to be leuiued in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gefes, the same that had lately benee chased out of Spaine by Scipio was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellowes, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the assistance of King Syphax, made him passable. Hee was then with the King his son-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conueighed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them backe laden into Sicill. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masanissa before him: who rode vnto the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vitica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath bene formerly made, and fate downe before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, assaying it both by Land and Sea, and vsing all his engines of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which must be well stored against the yeere following. Whence thus necessitie vrged him to leaue Vitica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprize, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which ioyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dis-lodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men hee lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shoare: in the bottome of the Creek he moted his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeere, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattell and other bootie Masanissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Come also hee had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicill and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, hee frigted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with captiues to be sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neere vnto Scipio, not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the seuer institution, which the Romans vsed in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neere, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps hee might be wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen prooffe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse weary with fatiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene inuited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe awhile: his wife Queene Sophonissa lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoeuer it were, Syphax did onely make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: & that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africke, and so make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors; he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, bins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed coverings of Mattes and Mats; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughs and leaues: vnder which they lay carelesly, without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee thought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, hee saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wares when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey, wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse, which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter, the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Ambassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surpris. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idle vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the wayes and entrances, with what ouer else was needfull. When he had learned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie; forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very peniue; as hauing lately persuaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to daule, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him: which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extreemly and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vitica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vitica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it, partly to hinder those of Vitica from setting vpon the few, that he purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. Hee caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes; that they might beeready for the iourney. After supper, he appointed such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Lelius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and giue Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly, that Lelius and Masanissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compassse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their king himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masaniissa, that best knew the Countrey, did great execution vpon them; hauing laid all the waies by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some rannt out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would serue to quench the fire. Others came vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame; and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. He therefore lost no time; but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue iudged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue beene said, that with lesse than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not beene only carefull how to saue his owne fearefull head. Neuertheless

Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue beene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striuen to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath beene is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued themselves in the darke: but they were not many, as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs haue beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Linie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often 30 elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting vp the summe. For he reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; forty thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and about six thousand to haue bin taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next town that was very strongly fortified, thought thereto find the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townes-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw, that the arrival of Scipio would soone giue an end: Wherefore, left they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; he shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the towne, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preferred it selfe from all manner of losse. The next two Townes adioyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason, when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastie prouision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any means. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new korees: especially, if Syphax would not leave them: It was therefore concluded, That they should send all their care this way, leuying in all haste another Armie; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately, the same their vnfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Grisco was employed, to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax, who hauing gathered together as many as hee could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne kingdom. Sophonisba laboured for with her husband, that at length shee wanne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they vfed, were not to be questioned. Euen the multitude within Carthage belequed these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be, which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole Countrey of Spaine had beene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lie; saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made vp an Army, consisting well-neere of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called, The Great Fields, about five dayes iourney from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or this; it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battail: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after the best wonted manner, hauing their Italian horse in the right wing, and Masaniissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battail. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntaunted followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Masaniissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time: euen vntill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy; since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacie was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdom: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him. Scipio, hauing thus gotten the mastery of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolved vpon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masaniissa, with his Numidians, and Lelium, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdom, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to now trouble. This aduice, it seems that Masaniissa gaue: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his reuocation into his owne kingdom, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lelium was sent away with Masaniissa; and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable blunders, which their proud Masters had laid vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italy. What to doe in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuertheless of their own free-will were likely to giue little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadours should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the In-land Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the City of Carthage: vpon the safety whereof they said all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not received; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless, it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre, without any aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That hee should immediatly come ouer into Africke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the Towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed therunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible piece adioyning, he easily tooke; the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neere. But whilst he was about there to Incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the City, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued, & stood in great feare, lest his own shippes, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily laden with engines of battery, & wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the townes) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall seruice. Wherefore he hastned away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, hee should haue come too late. Neither could he indeed haue beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: hee thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea; it should little auail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his shippes of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge ouer the Channel of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, wherewith his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and backe againe vpon any aduantage or need: but these he couered with planks, vsing the masts and yards of his shippes in stead of rafters, to ioyne all together, that his men might helpe one another, and the bridge it selfe not become asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betwene them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnsteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduenturing forth from behind the bridge, were greatly ouer-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw vpon the masts and yards which served as arches to ioyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselves as hastily as they could, by shuffling into the next ranke of shippes, that lay behinde them vntrouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away sixe shippes of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lulius and Masanissa, in their iourney against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The same of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his kingdome, without farther contention: the Masæsyli, his subiects, joyfully receiuing him, & forsaking the vsurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Afrabal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But besides the instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masæsyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lulius and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, bee the title vnto some part neuer so vnusult. Herunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that he had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that shee had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleued the kingdome of the Masæsyli to be part of his entrailes: Lulius and Masanissa will shortly giue him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossele (if it might be) that king, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had become continued into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to transpile the kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spaine from Cm. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haste: and few of them had seene warre before. Encamping nere vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foyle at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouer-charged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their own Troupes of horse, which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before, Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much, in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnappily, that hee was cast from his horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lulius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they hastned away to Cirra the chiefe City of the kingdome; whither he himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Laelius agreed, Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he perswayed to saue, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one strove to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yeelded her selfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Laelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was to his wife. But Laelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-intreated by Masanissa, hee suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministring to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnprovoked. He briefly answered: That his wife had moued him so to doe; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Laelius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa aparte, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had tittle other had, and that she was a mischieuous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to detace the memory of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom hee neuertheless intreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where after sometime spent in agony, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vse then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue): and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message: That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preferre her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for herselfe.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, shee onely said: That if her husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funeral. And here withall she boldly dranke off the poyson. Thus Laelius reporteth, but Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Laelius and Masanissa vpon their way thither; yeelding vp their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; hee fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeeres before. But Scipio would not heare of this; or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom the might appertaine. Wherefore hee willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim vtrother, wherein he should haue no wrong. Here withall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So hee shewed vnto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa his loue; and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him: add not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which Laelius notes) of the sudden falling put between him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great seruice. Howsoeuer it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should lead him to some inconuenience. Hauiug therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had destroyed of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed thereby way to diuert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaim a king: Which honour though Masanissa well deserued: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should he haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemeth not vnlikely, that had he remained a Nether in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his kingdome, it was no more than he deserued: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masæyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noyed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauity, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, inroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereto they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the sonne of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some piece of his fathers kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was punitious herein, and answered very grauely, That it was not their custome to giue the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such kings, as had greatly deserued of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proceesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogatiue, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

The Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallne their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masanissa their immortall enemy, had got possession of his kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the city, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to haue vniuersally broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to haue deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy vnto the city of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had to now twice deferred to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hannos, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans in their owne necessity, vnlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknewne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the city of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the war. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately bene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the wals of Carthage, though Vtica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace; yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these. That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italian and Gaule: That they should meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betwene Italy and Africke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, saue twenty; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the war had bene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lalius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fet open, and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African war, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by rendring them to liberty, should doe an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masaniissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King againe, released his Numidians that were captiues, and sent him two purple Caslocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to testify their good will. Scarcely were these and Lalius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors

were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lalius being sent for, came backe from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to winne time, and get respite for warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africke, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by removal of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lutatus Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since bene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome & the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a iest of a warre, that had bene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lutatus, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time, vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lalius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, wee finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceed vnto conclusion. This may with good reason bee beleueed, since it was not vnknewne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battell between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be auerse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleete out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken by foule-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wreck, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out vpon their Magistrates, that the should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women & boyes, to be meddling in vproaires; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleete was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station whereto their camp adioyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not onely for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieued; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the iniury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, that ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feete, after an vnusuall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfidiously broken the League that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels; should so soone forget what ye then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selues worthy to be destroyed, hauing onely recourse vnto our mercy, we are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that shew emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long hee hath bin pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Britians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stirre: so that ye are like to find his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a man; and not to be uincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? what gods will yee either sweare by, to be beleued, or call vpon in your misery? what words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe doe this, if yee seeke the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves vpbraid with the base demeanor of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Treue was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians took this in so ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto them, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great: or by the very reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two galleys appointed for their safe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Vtica. He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuier Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safety, since the Roman Camp was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them, in such manner, as they might well discerne his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slippt away, and made him ouer shoot himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chase, and had well-nere surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shoare ouer against them, and therefore aduented to runne their vessell aground: whereby they saved their owne liues, though a great part of their company were slaine, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartened in such a dishonorable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might bee driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not been giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, & teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

Hannibal spent the time after the Battaille of Metaurus. The doing of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were much affected by Hannibal's departure.

Ever since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Country of the Britians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Eluius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome, and slaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Collegue of Scipio bight worthy of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindered by the penitence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius; and Cn. Scipio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preferue his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand; that their chiefe enemy was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the war in Italy, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country strong, it might haue proved no lesse needfull for Scipio to retorne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the country of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prators. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthy of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull, in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prator, taking vnto him all the Roman Horfe, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselves hard; as if at that brunt the victory should haue bene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horfe: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horfe, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field, their Riders being vnable to manage them: Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auailable against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thicke. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shoure of darts, and killed foure of them, causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom he had in readines for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie, and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee receiued a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided euery one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætor's Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hot peece of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. Howeuer it were, this victory would haue much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound), into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; nor staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilest the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done, He told them, That thun yet to plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to mannaue the warre here. Scipio therefore shall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat, and ouerwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein he imbarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he slew, not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Læuina,³⁰ which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuary vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage, and departed out of Italy no lesse passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not ledde his Armie from Cannæ, hot and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue been foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal's departure out of Italy: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiuing vnto their gods; & extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for ioy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Country, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the war from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped, was enough to makethem presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Gold and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had bin borrowed in time of more necessity from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement, laid vpon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had bene wont to set out for the Warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very mozt of their ability. So confident were the Romans growne, though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatness of their spirit, vpon the good successe of the battaile at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italy had bene few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no speciality of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were cyther of those two. The Numidian King had bene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-souldiers, that were good for nothing, being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was only good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, shed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoiles, not onely of good souldiers, but of braue Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, Prætors and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had been first in getting ouer the Trenches of severall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Armie, as good as euer had serued in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vaine, loseth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemy; that hee might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpees, against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Country, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horse of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie, making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masaniissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that vsed it, preuailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mecetullus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masaniissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduersely to the Numidian kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Fernina the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masaniissa. This Fernina, as we finde in Liuius, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than 10. many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were, that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had bene so base as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for peace, whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to indure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they but earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal, requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, Hee thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choofe his owne times. Neurtherlesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zania; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadors; and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnpromisable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masinissa; and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Tenne Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masinissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more besides all his own forces would but little auale him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Africke. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the safety of his owne kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and fixe thousand Foot he made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lelius and Fulvius; who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Babi was one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Country, that hee had them in his power, & that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; & commanded Babi to vse them with all possible courteous, & send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies; & caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victory) far lesse honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, Hee made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to doe; they oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; heaving their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengeful minds, for the iniuries receiued. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay; what they were doing, and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trusting them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them what foucer they desired. This done, Hee gaue them leaue to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden hee grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personal conference, and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well, and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in a place conuenient. The next day Masinissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remooued vnto a Towne called Nalagata; neere vnto which hee sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, & close by

by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence hee sent word vnto the Carthaginians, That the time & place did fully serue. If he had ought to say to him, Hannibal heereupon removed from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemy: where hee incamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting; and the two Generalls each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a piece of ground; which was before well searched for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off; and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginians, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and Rome; if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk & of Italy; for that the Countreies of Sicill and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had beene shedde, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: Hee said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had beene exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition Hee assured that his owne yeares and long trial of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared; that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yes (said he) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice, to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victory at Cannæ, wonne the greatest part of Italie: and desired with my selfe, what I should doe with your Cities of Rome; which I hoped a city to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change? I stand heere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instability. I haue fought with thy father, Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generalls, that euermee met in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his Sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pagants, wherof I see but too many. And thou must haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soon I thinke vpon M. Attilius. If he would haue harkened vnto such perswasions, as I now vse to thee, he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man: And so must thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicill, Sardinia, and whatsoever Ilands else are situate betwene Italie and Africke, bee abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left vnto the Romans to beare Dominion therein? I thinke thou shalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well bee glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiet shall becomethy quiet, as our contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully obserue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must endure for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou must haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee, stay but until to morrow night; and thou must take such fortune, as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele wee shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victory, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more hide, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours deal scandalously of late in the like Treatie: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Country. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I haue maintained, vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the warre by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicill and in Spaine which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most iust. As for the mutability of Fortune hee said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene propounded whilst as yet ye desired some part of Italy, they might peradventure not haue beene reiected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one piece of these my former demands; to which the Carthaginians haue yeelded already, and thought mee to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they haue done me since, haue made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though are by thy meanes eased. Only thou must thinke, that in like sort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto vs ransom-free, all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs five thousand Talents; to deliuer vp their Gallies, and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce, their spoiling of our Fleet, and their imitating our Embellishments? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answer to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne felicity, for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell between Rome & Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldom been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behinde these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betwene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites, or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, he gaue direction, that when they found themselves to be ouer-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behinde all their owne Armie; thereby leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to saue themselves on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battalies, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masaniissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words, not many, but forcible. Hee bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their comming into Africke. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end; and that their victory in this war, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flee. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was, none other way, but death or victory: vntill they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, & take resolution anliuerable thereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front

Front of his Battaile. Next behinde these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Balears and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians & Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries, though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his owne right wing hee bestowd the Carthaginian Horse. Tychanus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. Hee was indeed farre too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychanus and Mezetubus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the foure thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor more other than such as could be leuiued in the haste of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and exp. & more helpe. Had Vermina the son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteene thousand and vpwards, the most of them Horse, the aduantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet so since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their feuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with ineuitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. Hee bade them to looke vpon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many; as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannae. Hee willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. Hee told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; euen such, as for their dauntly flight out of sundry battalies, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrey. As for the rest: they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred vp in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore hee entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue hee meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generals before the fight. When they drew neere together, the Numidian Horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwaies an vncertaine kind of helpe) those that stood neere vnto the point of the left wing, turned back for feare: and ran vpon their own Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disorderd. Masaniissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-ally themselves, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themselves, which gaue them open way, according as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ran backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disorderd the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelius the same aduantage, that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which he vsed in like sort. In the meane while, the battalies of foot aduanced, and drew neere together with a slow and watly pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell.

of the Principes, following somewhat neerer after the Hoplites, encouraged their fellowes, and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leiued Carthaginians & Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers giue back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Run-awaies. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at thuse of his owne side, that would haue ruined vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and saue themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee discoloured in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable ouerthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battaile of the Hanniballians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarii: He placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, hee advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer hee had bene receiued in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to haue bene a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fish; (and perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution; that no man giue backe one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground, whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worke: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrink; for as much as the returne of Masaniassa and Lulius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue bene most happye and in a needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hanniballians in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by mere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there died of the Romans fiftene hundred and vpwards: on the Carthaginian side, aboue twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken, of whom, Sipater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Tiberius reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disadvantage, he could worke no marvels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horse; and stayed not in his iourney, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage; from which he had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate Hee said plainly; That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadors againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoyled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions hee committed vnto Cn. Octavius, whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lulius way to Rome with newes of the victory, he set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by ten Embassadors from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauery, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vtica, and called back Octavius thither; with whom in person He set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their iourney thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the son of Siphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemed to haue bin both careless of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bin with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue bene far better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had other wise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access to the former, yet serued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behauiour though it was more pittifull than it had bin before, yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Neuertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilius Capi, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to retrain the ambition of this Consul Seruilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate; where he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere He could haue his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the iourney, whereunto man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so hee returned home a private man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now ended. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Prouince, That he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more fauourable answer vnto the Carthaginian Embassadors. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserved: and in regard thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withal in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes; without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection; leaving also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. Astouching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee, That immediately they should deliuer up vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Sagittines, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thenceforth out of Affricke, neither yet without Affricke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countreies, Townes, goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Masanilla, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should bee all by them restored vnto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should paytenne thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fiftie yeeres, by two hundred Talents a yeere; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choose, being none of them vnder foureteene yeeres of age, nor above thirtie.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them vnto the Citie. They were very vnpleasing; and therefore one Geseo stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Orator, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow; forasmuch as he had bene thence absent cuer since he was a Boy of nine yeeres old, vntill he was now a man of fife and fortie. Having thus excused himselfe of the disorder, hee discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the Demands of the Enemie bene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they resolu'd to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand fife and twenty thousand pounds weight of silver, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismishe any Embassadours to them self, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsailes. Afrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related vnto the Senate and People these ioyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedonia: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite awhile for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Pretors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately bene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellows; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betwene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Country-men, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay; and being taken prisoners in Affricke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiecton. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to bee one of the Kings Counsaile, and very inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willing to returne, and tell their Master, That warre he sought, and and warre he should finde, if he proceeded as hee had begun. For in two maine points hee had broken the League, that was betwene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that he had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entered into the Senate: and Afrubal, about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romans side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie, that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified, though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Periuice, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Afrubal made answer; Euen by the same gods, that are so seuer unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lulius the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace, for that hereby hee was like to lose the honour, which hee purposed to get by making warre in Affricke. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countrymen, which were prisoners in Rome: after wards, that they might ransom and carry home with them some, that were their especial friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would choose, should be sent out into Affricke, and be freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their coming into Affricke, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues and Renegado's, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegado's, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romans than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasure could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meet to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many, euen of the Senatours, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not reframe from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afrubal Hadru, and told, That it worke of all becomed him to laugh, since he had bin the cause why all others did weep; He answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometimes from extremie of indignation. Yet, said He, My laughter is more seasonable, and lesse absurd, than your sences. For yee should haue wept, when yee gaue up your Shippes and Elephants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the use of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder; and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, yee haue thereof thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, whereby this full acknowledgement, That it was the very least part of your miserie; for which yet hee shoud have beene. Thus did hee courted Hannibal vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruites of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of curing their owne diseases, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble endeauiours had bin employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Masinissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderstandably. To him also hee assigned ouer those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: where in to say truth, he gaue him but his due; & that which ought to haue beene knowen, well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully an answerable, now and hereafter, to all the desertings of this Numidian King. About Carthage they rested no more to be done: Wherefore the Romans imbarqued themselves for Sicilie, where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Army tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as hee passed along. Hee entered the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether hee were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. This much may be arowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faue and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous warre past, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that euer they should see Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: siliing him by the name of that Prouince which hee had subdued. This honourable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

For the great similitude found in worldly euent, the limitation of matter hath beene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needs bee finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, wee are lesse to wonder, if wee finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious obnoxious vnto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundrie men are ouer-ruled: in managing the affaires of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof wee now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdome of Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot; and therefor thousand Horie: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subiect within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such number of men; as might haue seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home againe, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trayned Armie, had made attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue beene farre different. Yet would it then haue beene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men; rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auailable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse- vnderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noyse, aduventure to prouoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their owne glorie should bee soyled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him as (I take it) Enimeroch, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souldier than any other Greekish King, when hee entered into warre against the Romans. This warre hee vnderooke as it were for his minds sake: hauing received no iniurie, but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that serued vnder him, to prouide so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicilie and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own vertue to be of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatsoeuer else had serued to make him terrible) serue only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. For since they had overcome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compasse of 12. yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had wonne? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by some good meanes, the whole Countrey of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punicke warre was ended, which followed soone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise, very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the same time cruell war vpon the Greekes: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Townes, onely because they were vnable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter, the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to bee desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for loue of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreased vnto hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them, being now the subject of four storic, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countreies knowne; and 3. of them young boyes; in 3. of the greatest Kingdomes. This happened in the third yeere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died: Selucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great Ptolomie Philopater succeeded in the Kingdome of Egypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaeans and most of the Greeks; 10 by the decaise of his Vnle Antigonus, Deson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About this same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedaemon, & the Countreies about Mount Taurus. For Antiochus then began his reigne in Cappadocia; Lycurgus found means to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedaemonians, whose Commonwealth, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse, and Antiochus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebelle vnto him, occupied the Regions neere vnto Mount Taurus, & kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and thirde yeeres of the hundred & fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome & Carthage; & that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomie, & the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaeans, and many others his dependants. That Countrey, having freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes, was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonians, than it should haue bene to the Spartans; & therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Aetolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings; that were Patrons thereof. The Aetolians were no men to beadle, nor were much addicted vnto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, than it was vnjust; whereby with greater ease they made spoyle of the Countrey, finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaeans, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians passing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aetolians could hardly abide these Aetolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries; wherewith most ingratfully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achaeans. Hee was therefore so hastic to fall vpon this their Army, that hee could hardly endure to stay few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaeans for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath bene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a part of the Countrey, wherein he might very easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaeans, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacy. Shortly after, the Aetolians invaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. 10 They ioyned with them, in this their second inuasion, a great number of the Illyrians; who neglecting that Condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the coast of Grece: made bold to, seek aduentures againe, & did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lofe his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Serdidaites, or Serdaites, hauing gotten gotten what they could else where, hymming as Serapion accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made great waile in the Countrey, more than in their former Expeditiō, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things, great complaint was made among the Aetolians, when they came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy reuenges, there were they vrged to haue some grieuous punishments layd vpon the Lacedaemonians, who were thought vnder hand to haue favoured the Aetolians, in their delight of the Achaeans and Macedonians by whom themselves had lately bene supplid. It is true, that the Lacedaemonians had bene in affected: and which was working at the arrival of Philip, they flew such friends of his as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appease them of the intended rebellion: and their duty they would commit themselves to iudgement; but amongst the King, that he would not take from counting to them with an Army; since their Townes, yea, whole much distressed with civil disorder, which they hoped soone to appeale; and mean whiles to continue in this deception. Philip was easily satisfied with this: so that he for ever forbad Antiochus, who then wholly gouerned him, did not understand the Lacedaemonians; but for their greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaeans, Boeotians, Epirotes, and Acarnanians; all complaining vpon the Aetolians; and desiring to haue war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Aetolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could, alludge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose; which if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day. But when the Aetolians understood this, for certaine, they adourned the Consequitima for a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Aetolians. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made a speech of Serapion to be their Prator, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man; 10 in sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where hee prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Serdidaites, with faire words, and promises, whom he easily won from the Aetolian despoils; much as the Aetolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaeans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirotes, Messenians, and Lacedaemonians; requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war vnto the Aetolians; without saying as it were to awake the euent. Hereunto they received direct answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, free hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Aetolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to hearken their faithful meaning in that warre, which was concluded by general assent. The Epirotes that were more mighty, were neuertheless more cunning, and excused also that they stood upon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, who whose cause the warre was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne, which the Aetolians held vpon their borders, and said, that they durst not beouer bold, vntill that biddie were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedaemonians, the chiefe of them studied onely, how to manage the reputation, for which there City had bene lately 10 pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together, continued subiect against their wills to the Macedonians, exposing still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt to reigne ouer them againe, and maintaine, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some; that thought the publike safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had promised them: And hereto they referred all their counsels: being perhaps little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which in the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were still debating how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his returne, & sought to Royne with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to giue him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority and durst more freely speake their minds: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders or any other violent courses to reforme their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes's death: For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatness and lustre, to which once hee had in a manner performed: But since hee was dead; and that, without ability to his well-deserving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and those of the race of Heracles, as in former times; so that without such helpees, they must continue little better than subiects vnto the Macedonian, and farre lesse by him respected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassage to Sparta, which propounded the matter openly vnto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst haue hid himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hot, there was, betwene those of the Macedonian partie, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; vnto till by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Ætolians, the difference of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betwene the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had spared the Citie, when they might haue destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may iustly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choyce of the other. In the one of their royall Families they found Agisippus, the sonne of Agisipolis, the sonne of King Cleombrotus; and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparent to his grandfather. This Agisippus was a yong Boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an vncke, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how young soeuer, should haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appointed his vncke Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of on Lycargus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed vpon each of the Ephors, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe bee saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Heracles. This Lycargus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to approue his worth by act, on, invaded the Countrey of the Argiues: which lay open and vnguarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and won diuers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedæmon. After such open hostility, the Lacedæmonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise; than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gaue vncertaine answer: the Messinians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselves and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by fauour of the Elæans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe, and by helpe of the Lacedæmonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Aegira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby grievously haue molested the Achæans, for that it stood in the mid-way betwene Aegium and Sycion, two of their principall Cities; and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Aegira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoyle, whilst they that should haue made it their first care, to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the citadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedlesly to ransacke priuate houses, and thereby gaue

the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Armie landing among the Elæans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territorie of the Dymæans and other people; that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacie. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achæans hauing lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes's warre, they had so couetously with-held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disability of the Achæans, and insufficiency of their Prætor, the Dymæans, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice; & to conuert the money to their own defence. Lycargus also, with his Lacedæmonians, began to win vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip & the Achæans. Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him; & by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their owne hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming in; it was thought that he might haue had an end of the war: But happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunity of Associates, to haue their owne desires fulfilled, conuerts the preparations of great kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine designs. Thus was our king Henrie the eight led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Tourmay: at such time as the French king Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that his Cauallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambratus, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas aduentured to leade all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Theffalie, butto make impression into Macedon. Hyacinthe as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea; which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, He tooke, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all; and among the rest, hee threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey-men at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to bee growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambratus, made a strong inuasion vpon Ætolia. He tooke Phoetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pzanium, Elæus, and diuers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes, and wasted all the Countrey ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Elæans, wheteto he was vehemently solicited by the Achæan Embassadors, newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrey. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hæmus from the Northerne part of Macedon, & were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourney into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had beene their manner vpon the like advantages. This made the King to dismissthe Achæan Embassadors, (whom he should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeere. So hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired vnto him Demetrius Phærius; with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dofon in the warres of Cleomenes; and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaine. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome into the Macedonian King: whose Counsaillour he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Aetolians rested not. They aunged themselves vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Aetolia, they required 10 with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre, vntill another yeere, was laid aside: Philip stole a journey into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as he was within Corinth: He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word should be carried sooth of his arriuall. He sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achæan Souldiers ready to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse, little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeede they had little cause to feare; since the Achæans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians, vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Aetolians, and their fellowes, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchased both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. He won Plophis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. He won it by assault at his first coming: where in it much auailed him, that the Enemy, not beleuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was presented by the King from sacke, & giuen to the Achæans, of his own meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yielded for very feare, hearing how easily he had taken Plophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achæans. The like liberality he vsed towards others, that had ancientlie vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaine, and refreshed his Armie three daies; He proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Aetolians in the spoiles of their other wife-deferuing neighbours. Great abundance of Garbidge he tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes, whereinto a great multitude of the Countrey-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his journey, by sending his souldiers, to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garbisons against their wills, tooke courage to set themselves at libertie, by seeing the King soeuer; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoken by the Aetolian Captaine, because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wonne more Townes in the Countrey, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to stay three daies. Faine he would haue fought with the Aetolians; but they made such haste from him, that he could not ouertake them, till they had couered themselves with in the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue bene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place, obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this expedition, the King repos'd himselfe awhile in Megalopolis; and then remooued to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arriuall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; & threatned to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him, nor from those ialousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way therunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common wealth. Hee wonne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst he was vsing his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabouts they went, and shifted presently away. So he fled afterwards among the Achæans a banished man; and hated of his owne people. As for Lycurgus, hee returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to driue out his fellow-King young Agisipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to bee suspected, in such sort, as once hee should haue bene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue bene defended, yet rather than to aduenture himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and to iourne among his friends the Aetolians. His well-knownne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmisest against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, He tooke better heede vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions hee got to the same state Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chased Agisipolis out of the Citie, I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, that his being the first of three vrsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the ranke of Tyrants, which the last of the three very iustly deserved. Whatsoeuer he was toward some priuate Citizens: in the warre against Philip, he behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countiees good.

Now Philip was misadvised by his Counsaillors, who afterwards wrought treason against him; and miserably punished. Hee made the Aetolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace, which is granted vnto them.

While the King lay at Argos dwelling vpon his businesse for the yeer following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Dofon had left some Philip such Counsaillors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of these was Capellen, that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, although that hee should bee a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if hee could reduce the Aetolians, vnto the same degree of subiectiō, wherein the Macedonians stood; so being thus possessed during his date Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thinke the Achæans of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Providing further no occasion fell out, Hee was bold to chiefe some of that Nation, causing his Ministers to take good whippes, & if any of them offered as hee were, some of them that could not reframe to helpe their fellowes; then he laid by the heels, and punished the others. Hurely he thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that he should be equalled with an habit of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vnjust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible to matters of liberty, & were so, if they could haue bene contented so to suffer any little little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves vnto olde Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. Hee thought so well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court, promising to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, hee must be faine to deale precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conforme themselves vnto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to bee present at Aegium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue bin needefull in a businesse of more importance; the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, that Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new fauourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yielded it vp for feare at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner, because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vnderooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Atolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand; That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all foreign inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breed a mutuall diffidence betwene them, and the Atolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner vnto Atolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the king (as was said) maruailing what should be the cause, that hee heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailler thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the kings good. And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out: For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside: & giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the kings offers. All this was a falselye; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance making talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all he rested, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein hauing made it knowne what ye are, to depart into Macedonia; and leaue you to your selues. Old Aratus grauely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to giue credite, vntill hee had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the king should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achæa, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the king liked well; and said that hee would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilst Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The king was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when he found no better than a mere deuice against his honourable friends, Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The vtterfull tempest of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe, beganne (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arati: so sayling of them; he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chieftie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtilt workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip: Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leanius Captaine of the Targuettiers, & Megalas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remoue the others two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinary way; by calumny and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he vsed more finess: loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, & one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art hee thought to haue remoued him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sonne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achæa, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; Hee was a man of no dispatch; and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deal of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corne; wherewith hee should haue bene furnished by the Achæans. This made the King vnderstand his owne error; which hee wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achæans to reioiune their Parliament from Aegium, to Sytyon, the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as hee himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, hee should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so he might inuade the Atolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracie with Leptinus and Megalas: binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and being

bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability, to do any thing without them, should make him speake them faire, and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child, and therefore these wifemen perswaded themselves, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out id through their own misgovernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child: still Apelles would needs goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behind with the King, to play their parts: all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His Fleet and Armie being in a readinesse, Philip made countenance, as if hee would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therfore, the Aetolians sent many: but the fearing that the mischiefe would haue fallen, as soone after it did, vpon themselves, for against the Eleans and those that came to helpe them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achaens, with some part of his & their Mercenaries. He himselfe with the boole of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephalonia; whence the Aetolians dy of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephalonia; whence the Aetolians dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palea, that had bene very seruiciable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates; and might bee very vefull to him, if hee could get it. Whilst hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene shippes of warre from Scerdilaidas; and many good souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnani-ans, and Messenians. But the Town was obstinate; and would not bee terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts saue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foote thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to doe his best, and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foyle, and many slaine, not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Townsmen to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst hee stood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Messenians alleged, that Lycorgus was busie in wasting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnwares in one day; the Etolian windes which then blew, seruing fitly for his Nauigation. Heereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dogge-daves) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and prevailed. He shewed how vsfiting it were, to let the Aetolians ouer-runne all thessale againe, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small aduentures. Rather, hee said that the time now serued well to carry the warre into Aetolia; since the Prator was gone thence, a-broad on roving, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycorgus, he was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus; and it might suffice, if the Achaens, were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets sayle for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which diuided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. He marched vp into the in-land Countrey; and taking some places by the way, which he so fitted with Garrisons to assure his Retreat. He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and furest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steep, & difficult ascent: There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne Games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the naturall strength had made them carelesse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoile whereof whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the paines of his journey well recompensed. So he loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of their like worship, they had vpon the Temples of Diana and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue bene forborne. But perhaps hee thought, as Adoniscus de Gourges the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Aetolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleue to be fore; and therefore was not taken vnwares: Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Illyrians, who staying behind the rest, did set vpon the backs of the Aetolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, hee returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that hee had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him. Hee safely carried all that hee had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieved them to think; that they should be able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse, since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuelling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uprore; may running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to giue him froward answers: in so much, as they said at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes belated to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, it was euen I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crimon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crimon being remanded back to prison; and Leontius becoming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as hee was at Corinth, hee tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedaemonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Achaens had opposed them as well as they could, with ill successe, yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would haue done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrey about Lacedaemon; & was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleue that he was returned out of Aetolia. Hee took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and hauing beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattell, slaues, and other Countie-spoyle. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience: and hee willed them to deale first with the Aetolians; who if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Ætoliāns had sped ill that yeer: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the centre of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans & Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seek their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætoliāns readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalus thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sortd to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noyse, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiers themselues, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalus were afraid, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repaire vnto Corinth, where hee might stand betwene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the businesse, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was hee grown in to such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselves vnto him, and receiued from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that mony, and all things needefull for the publike seruice, should bee wanting. Yea hee enforced the King, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolute these and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, beuiled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would giue assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iourney from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the city of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megalus drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falsehood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megalus to looke to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of seruice, but in deede of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signify what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, hee might not bee called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megalus, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more baste than else he would haue beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megalus were intercepted, which hee wrote vnto the Ætoliāns, vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen ready to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the King vnderstood more perfectly the falsehood, not onely of Megalus, but of Apelles; whose cunning head laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalus that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megalus ally, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his owne life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Ætoliāns, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they liked in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megalus, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium, of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this quyet Nation, He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning & continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to pre pare for war against the yeere following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian souldiers, by yielding to let them winter in their owne Countrey. In his returne homeward, he called to iudgement one Protonius, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians, and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthy to die that was but so his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their Tavour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardaniāns, Ætoliāns, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when he had thus provided for safetie of his owne; the Ætoliāns might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Egypt, and from the City of Byzantium, recontinuing the former sollicitation about the Peace. This passion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrey at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde vnto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good souldiers. But hereby it came to passe, that the more sroward fort, especially the Ætoliāns, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The issue of Greece would bee sufficient for to reddeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer vnto the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present affraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Ætoliāns, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first bee dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as hee should thinke fit.

LIII

Philip

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middelt of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the Battaille at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Hereby hee grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Aetolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Aetolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians, had subdued one the other, it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrey should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such aduice could the Aetolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from obliuishing and following their own good counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrey) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene Hannibal and Philip.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italy, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaille of Cannæ: after which hee ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise bene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Aetolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue bene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had bene ouer-long to haue bene inserted into a more busie peace.

tweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the sonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the sonne of Demetrius hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules, and Tolau, before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sun, the Moone, and the Earth; before Riuers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power over Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betwene You and Vs, that this oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that wee become friends, familiar, and brethren, vpon Courant, that the safetie of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians vsing the same Lawes, and of the Vticans, & as many Cities & Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, be saued and preferred by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italy. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, we shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Townes, with which we haue already league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we haue already league and friendship. The warre that we haue with the Romans, haue we also with them, untill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Wee shall aide Vs with those things whereof wee haue need, and shall doe according to the Couenants betwene Vs. For if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, Wee shall make friendship in such wise that we shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corcyreans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make warre vpon You or Vs; we will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue need. The same shall be observed in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold already league and friendship. To this league if we or You shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. II. II.

How Philip yeelded to his naturall vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Associates: with the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick warre. Hee posseneth Aratus: and grows hatefull to the Acheans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, hee might haue offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punick warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath bene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listning to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in man such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before hee should busie himselfe in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boytserous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obscure the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betwene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forreign warre) vnto domestick objects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strue any more about their Gouernment: for that hee would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his coming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this renowned old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Leues, to bridle the insolence of the vnrulie Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it but to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrats, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogs their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear, to tel him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should need the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. Hee ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice hee did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne use, for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which hee had already commanded the entrance into that Countie. Whilst hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the beaſt deliuered into his hands, as was the manner, hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a little: were it onely for desire to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a good Player, thou must see thy waies, and let slip this good aduantage. If thou bee a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus hee, speaking resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in durie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduise, Philip yeelded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene Him and the Aratis, whom he thought more froward than befemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as hee plainly discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise hee perceived, that in resorting to his house, Hee had bene dishonest with his sonnes wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countreiman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this iourney hee found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That vn honest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers & dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needs haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, He seized vpon their Towne of Orjeum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus in stead of seiling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilst hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue fought for him in Italy: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts, who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrences whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In manning whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourney into their Countie, with hope to deceiue them as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open Warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene hee lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailler and Flatterer, not his penerter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee paysoned olde Aratus; and shortly after that he paysoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue bene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the paysons themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated every yeere twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose, as was accustomed vnto the Heracles, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to haue beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollon, which is like enough to haue bene true, since the helpe of the Demetrius is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The following memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achæans a marvellous dislike, of that wicked King, which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take countsaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in case to subtil, without his helpe that had committed it. The Ætolians were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league, whereof the Conditions were soone divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Ætolians should haue the country and Townes; but the Romans the spoyle, and carry away the people to sell for slaues. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make freight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more auerse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauock of the Countrey. The same consideration moued also the Lacedæmonians, to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Ætolians, whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industry therefore of Philop, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto conuincit. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymæans, by an inestimable benefit: rescuing their Towne after it had bene taken by the Romans and Ætolians, and redeeming their people wherefoer they might be found, that had been carried away Captiue, and sold abroad for slaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past, if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen him to vnderstand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodness. Among other foule acts, whereof hee was not ashamed; He tooke Polyxasta the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for, of that which hapned in this their first Inuasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

S. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battaile betwene them, wherein Machanidas is slaine.

IT happens often, that the discale of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopœmen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and hauing his command; did especial seruice to Antigonum at the battaile of Selassia against Cleomenes: Thence forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom vntogether at peace betwene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, traunailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie, to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them vpon all exercise of seruice, that he made the Achæans very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterwarde chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, He had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others; Hee perfwaded the Achæans to cut off their vaine

expence of brauery in apparell, houshold stuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to procure the better Souldiers, and fixable in behaviour, vnto the pride of their similitude. They had leuied hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast a farre off; that were vnto in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, but sudden and halfe expeditions; whereto Aratus had bene most accustomed. But when they came to handie strokes, they were good for nothing; so long as they were wholly driuen to rely vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to araine themselves more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deep as had bene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight moneths were spent of that year, in which he first was Prætor of the Achæans, when Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedæmon caused him to maketriall, how his souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor vnto Lycorgus, a man more violent than his fore-goe. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta, but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achæans, that were fauourers of liberty, but to strengthen himselfe by friendship of the Ætolians; who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedæmon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argiues, Achæans, & Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recouering the Mistrice of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him ready to fall vpon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilest they were enfeebled, by greater necessity, to turne face another way: Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philop: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achæans, and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilest Philop theretore was busied else where, he entred the Countrey of the Mantinians; being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger friends, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertaine him at Mantinea, where was fought betwene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Carriage a great many of Engines, wherewith to beat vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one & the other side came in continuall supply, till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achæans & of Machanidas, were drawn vp to the fight: being so farre aduanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnseruiceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Canon is hindred from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States: For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which liue oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne struittude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their own; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motivation to the manfully than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victory: many companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast and therefore such good fellows will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers: because that after it, he doth wrong to more, as having more subjects; and shortly stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Achazans, being forced to give ground, were vied so violently in their retreat by those of Machanidas, that shortly they betooke themselves to flight; and could not be held by any persuasions of Philopemen, but ran away quite beyond the battaile of the Achazans. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopemen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore the victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chase vnto those that fled: leauing behind him in good order of battail his Lacedaemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deale with the Achazans, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of fight; Philopemen aduanced towards the Lacedaemonians that stood before him. There lay between them a whart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passible (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedaemonians aduented ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achazans; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaille; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Achazans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first 10 ranks being broken, all the rest beganne to shrink: so as Philopemen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopemen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machanidas had done: He suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chase: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the tyrant must come backe. The tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heauily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lusty troupe of Horse about him, he made towards the bridge: hoping to finde the Achazans in disorder; and to set vpon their backs, as they were carelesly pursuing their victory. But when hee and his company saw Philopemen ready to make good the bridge against them; then began euery one to look, which way 30 he might shift for himselfe. The tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side, and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassoock, & the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopemen therefore leauing the charge of the bridge to another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his own hand. There dyed in this Battaille of the Lacedaemonians side about foure thousand; and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achazan Mercenaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that Warre was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bythinia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Achazans learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of warre inferior to any, that should haue brought against them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: but when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Attolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very peereley together, and some of them dishonest: wherein if the Achazans would haue done him seruice, they must, by helping him to oppress others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had ioyned with the Romans and Attolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a king, was scarce yet a Noble-man, otherwise than as hee was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Phileterus his Vnkle: who being gilded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child; grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times repayed much confidence in Eunuchs, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wifes or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke him selfe to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accomps. But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant: He fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The Towne and money, together with his owne seruice, hee offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to giue Lyfimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleucus hauing slaine Lyfimachus, dyed shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Phileterus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty yeeres as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue bene a poore Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better; before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Phileterus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the dissention, betwene Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus the great, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that serued vnder his Enemy, he used a pretty deuice. He wrote the word Victory vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off; and when the hot liuer of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly foreshewing that the gods would be assistant in that Battaille.

After this victory, he grew a dreadful enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recouer from him, by Warre, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, 30 when he had reigned two and twenty yeeres, he died by a surfeit of ouer-much drinke, and left his kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the youngest brother of Phileterus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Achzus: who setting vp himselfe as king against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his owne City of Pergamus: but by the helpe of the Tectosage, a nation of the Gauls, whom he called ouer out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters, or interposed themselves, without invitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his war against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neuertheless within a while after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victory; and used it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheless, presuming afterwards vpon their strength; they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee 30 being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armes of those, that could best hyre them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saued themselves and their Provinces, in the slothfull reigne of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Arosta, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Persides, as is shewed before. But the son of that king, whom Predicator crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themselves, recovered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire, & are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themselves from Pylmenes, a king that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bythinia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calanus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Country; where hee was vanquished. They had after-wards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom we haue already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Towne of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

P*rusias* as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected, He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philippas Attalus, on the contrary side, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Etolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Etolian warre, and was deuiuing with Antiochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptoleme Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong childe his heire, the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and bestow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iust matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst he lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: intreating him to forsake the enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request, when he intended nothing lesse. At length he got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had seemed to regardfull, hee omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby hee rendered himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his fact was detested of the Rhodians, who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani: and were aduertised by Embassadors of purpose sent vnto them from Philip. That, howsoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as soone as hee listed: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, He was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemency, the Embassadors said, that he would manifest vnto the world, what slanderous tongues they were, which noyfed abroad such reports, as went of his fallhood and oppression. Whilst the Embassadors were declaring at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect, there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked & destroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despite, no lesse were the Etolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lyfismachia & Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this king. But most of all others was Attalus moued with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, & of his owne estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new king, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberality the loue of the Athensians, which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, hauing lost their owne. On the friendship of the Etolians hee had cause to presume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States he easily drew into a streight alliance with him; by their hatred newly contaiued against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends; but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open warre. It had bene vnseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to fassen vpon Asia was manifest, and his fallhood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire; They met with him shortly not farr from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians took his death wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie; by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks vpon the shoare: Yet so far as he had suffered far greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemy: and since he durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards beleaged and wonne some Townes in Caria: whether only in a brauery, and to despite his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest, it is vnertain. The stratageme, by which hee wonne Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the earth so stony, that it resisted his worke, he neuertheless commanded the Pioners to make a noise vnder ground, and secretly in the night-time he raised great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the beleaged, that the work went maruellously forward. At length he sent word to the Town-men, that by his vnder-mining, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon wooden proppes, to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had bene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced, and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemy had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back into Macedonia, whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against Philip. The Athenians vpon slight cause, proclaime warre against Philip; moued thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Ambassadors. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

These Asiaticque matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet serued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedonia, at least with a conceit that they were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece curd since the reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturalis: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had bene most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless weary of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Country were such, that euery petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loane to the Republike, all their money: neither had they as yet receiued; neither did they receiue yttill fifteene or sixteene yeares after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present mony, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest a while; and bestow that more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeede no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece; to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Aetolians their good friends, (and in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affaires of those that were more mighty than himselfe. He was too vnskillfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And hee found them such, as hee deferred to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harme. It beloued him therefore, either to haue restrained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or in desisting from that iniurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs so past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But he, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they thinke themselves iustly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly persuaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inuiolable, saue onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it binds one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparant, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) be presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was the River of Stryx dried vp: and then could they sweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selues, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Scopar into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly said to bee auailable vnto felicitie after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparant, that they came into the place by meere error, not thinking to haue therein done amiss; yet, as it had bene for some haynous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and sought to reuenge it as a publike iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword, and carried thence a great booty. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians, and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadors to king Attalus, gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and intreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing, because he vnderstood that the Roman Embassadors, hauing about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom hee had much friendly conference: they reioicing that he continued enemy to Philip; & he being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children; in as solemn a pompe as they could deuise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obseruance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: wherethey desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which hee studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that hee should deliuer in writing, what he would haue to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing & ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, he protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little intreatie: for they were as willing to proclaim the warre, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue, and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

This began a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while they were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Aetolians to their partie; that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Aenus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellespont, he laid siege vnto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it selfe against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrivene Gallie; and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre too weak an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadors C. Claudius, M. Aemilius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolomee Euerghanes king of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian king was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Ptolemy had done before him) he beganne a very yong boy. The courtelle for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately bene supplied with Corne, in a time of Extreame Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their owne Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadors both leasure and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Aemilius, the yongest of them should steepe aside, & visite Philip, to try if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydus; which els he was like to carry. Aemilius, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom he made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the towne of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependencie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that he did onely require them with the like. Doe you also (said Aemilius) requite these poore Abydians with such terrible warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore hee roundly made answer to Aemilius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (about all) your being a Roman, that maketh you thus presumptuous. But I would wish to remember the League that ye haue made with me, and to keepe it: if ye doe otherwise, I will make ye vnderstand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died e. uery one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions: But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leasure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the town; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decre warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THIS calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italie; whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in six moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vnder-take: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africa, to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleue, that this war with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastened away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before; and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancie (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Town, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Ptolemaeus, but took the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the Riuer of Apfus, betwene Dyrrachium & Apollonia, there began the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilst hee was farre from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them.

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater deligne. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Rauiers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Euboea, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoyle their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of the two townes: The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in the declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserued them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had been wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cilic; to make war vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise: wasteth the Country about, and makes a iourney into Peloponnesus. O' Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife, Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achaeans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Aetolians into the Warre.

PHILIP returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainment, or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew soone weary of sitting as a scare-crow, to sue the Athenians grounds from spayle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Towne-men, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius hauing advertisement, failed thither by night, for feare of being descryed: and arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado, Hee killed no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and warning men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither wore He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their shippes, & with inlarging all those, whom Philip as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but, to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they hastened away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The king lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whether when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet he made all haste to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their truely friends, busie at worke in ransacking the towne, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to bury the dead, hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post had not stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descryed him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Cittadell to sound the Alarme, and with all speede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his coming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Clandius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compassse about by sea, and had no cause of haste) yet hauing in the towne some mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of citizens, they aduerted to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The king was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight hee gaue singular prooffe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, drage them with great slaughter backe into the citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the city. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none, but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Egina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, Hee came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achæans were desiring vpon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started vp in the room of Machaniadas, did greater mischiefe than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his mercenaries: and of his subiects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him: and one that in his natural condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apaga was very fitly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoyleing the men, than hers in fleecing their wives; whom she would neuer suffer to beeat quiet, till they had presented her with all their Jewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to be made, liuely representing her; & apparelled it with such costly garments as she vsed to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, seruing to torment men. Heereof hee made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; hee would bring him into the room where this Counterfait Apaga stood, and there vse all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses, then choke hee the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apaga (who sate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So he ledde him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith the griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Governement. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Ætoliens, as Machaniadas and Iphicrates had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopemenus vertue he stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achæans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a warre worde Capitaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopemenus being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre; then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wassing all the fields, made them distrust their owne safety in the Townes.

Against

Against this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had let downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporations should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made warre vpon Lacedæmon, He ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, & some Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his denice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answere, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis, he brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had bene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achæans. Neuertheless he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had bene doing what harme he might vnto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyrcus, and euen the citie of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euery of these places; that he could no more than wreake his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So hee destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe bene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vsueruicible to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, hee went home into Macedon: & there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbors, which were likely to infect him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætoliens: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the Riuer of Apfus. Thence hee sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon: Apustius tooke sundry Castles and Townes, vsing such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian captaine: but the Romans had the better, & killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more; to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safety at their camp. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Country lay betwene the Ætoliens and the Thessalies, might be perhaps auailable with the Ætoliens, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, & Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his master and the Ætoliens: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætoliens, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Ætoliens, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greeks. For euen after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian tyrants, but now both Syracuse & Messina, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alledged many examples; adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Aetolians: who if they drew such masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, & send them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rometo Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres ago made the peace which still continued, although that the very same Romans wereth. against it, who sought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing wherunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of reerimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to cal the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne king had, in few daies past, made Warre vpon the gods the ancelues, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pittifull rehearsal of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Aetolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Atinerna, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were liketo haue felt, if the walles and the Roman armies had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They said, that they had of late made Warre in the Aetolians behalfe, and that the Aetolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Aetolians must excuse themselves, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aide conuenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Aetolians to take part with them in their war and victory, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, In offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the warre by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue been the cause, why Dorymachus the Aetolian Prator shifted them off awhile with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Country-men, That by reseruing themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That overmuch haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, Hee passed a Decree, That the Prator might at anytime call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude vpon that businesse, any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were holden fit times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Aetolians renade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Romanes.

Philip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Aetolians. Hee thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardani-ans;

Dardani-ans; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his Army. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how yong-soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies, by making them at least beleue, that hee was not weakely attended. And this may haue bene the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Aetolia by his father; whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heraclides, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by Sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourney Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armes met in the Countrey of the Deffaretij, a people in the ymost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candaula; that running along from Haemus in the North vntill they ioine in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that illud forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the king was vnwilling to hazzard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increas his owne forces; yet being no lesse vnwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would haue fought. Hee had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambuill, wherein hee bestowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains to prouoke out the Romans to fight, instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectiue, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambuill, hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they deaue him to an haity flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able, but the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, dis-countered themselves before it was time, and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the king had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kinde of help which the Romans had neuer vsed before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about foure score yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to assaile the Romans, who had neuer seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet aliue, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks haue none. Philip had patience to let the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time: neither could he, without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in come out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: presuming that Philip would not aduenture to meet him on euery ground; and so the more boldly hee suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The king was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed foot, with which hee occupied a place in the mid-way, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There hee stayed in Court with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the king and his companies in their flight: soas they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went:

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were caualling the field, tooke their task where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disadvantage; as coming fower, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an haruest, he was too greedily about a poore gleanng: the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne safetie. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are feldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemie, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Mari-thes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee beene cast away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted, mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with imprudent rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dullnesse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnlikely, That if the Romans following the king, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that Noble Historian, Lince, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonishd with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage therinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenure to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not flow to follow him. He ouertook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalaris was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruicable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Army; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home, whilst he himselfe went against the Atolians. For Damocritus the Prator of the Atolians, who had referred himselfe and his Nation vnto the cuent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & againe; as also that Pleuratus & the Dardanians were fallen vpon Macedonia; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had beene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Antimander the Athamian; and made inuasion vpon Thessaly. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Camp; if Aminander, more warie than the Atolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Atalms and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Aegean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Atalms, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Atolians: the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindered; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. warre of the Gaules in Italy. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, Masaniissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintus Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Consul, tooke charge of the warre in Macedonia. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, hauing serued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannæ: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long absent from Italy; whither faine they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedonia. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the History of this yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antius, as we finde in Lince, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Lince himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Author; so we may reasonably beleuee, that Villius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could haue beene expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had beene able to force, was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saued her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staid behinde Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behooued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seeme otherwise to haue fauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitiue Raues belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authorities to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors, vpon such termes as they should thinke fit, without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite; requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masaniſſa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horſe: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embaſſadours, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any diſputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans buſied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it ſtrongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they laide ſiege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prator came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile; and the fruit of the victorie was ſuch, as both made amends for loſſes paſt, and left the worke eaſie to thoſe, that afterwards ſhould haue the managing of warre among thoſe Gaules. So was their good leiſure to thinke vpon the buſineſſe of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his Subiects, by puniſhing a bad Counſailour whom they hated; as alſo to aſſure vnto himſelfe the Achæans, by rendering vnto them ſome Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to ſtrengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exerciſing and trayning his people, but by fortifying the paſſages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Vilius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a iourney (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be ſupplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new courſe. But then came aduertement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was choſen Conſul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whole coming was expected; and he very ſhortly arrived at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a paſſage againſt Philip. Theſſaly wiſted by Philip, the Romans, and Aſtolians. The Achæans ſurſaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip deliſers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who preſently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not bene wont in former times, to make Warre after ſuch a trifling manner. It was their uſe, to giue battaile to the Enemy, as ſoone as they met with him. If he reſuſed it, they beſieged his Townes: and ſo forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his diſadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weakneſſe. But in this their Warre with Philip, they began to learne of the ſubtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne ſo ſincere, as within a little while they proued. Their Treſury was poore, and ſtood indebted,* many yeeres after this, vnto priuier men, for part of thoſe monies that had bene borrowed in the ſecond Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerſe from the Macedonian warre; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make uſe of their cunning. Yet being weary of the ſlow pace wherewith their buſineſſe went forward, they determined to increaſe their Armie, that they might haue the leiſure need to relie vpon their Confederates. So they leuied eight thouſand Foot, and eight hundred Horſe (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they ſent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Conſul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue ſerued, for the ſetting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by ſtraining themſelves to the moſt of their ability, they ſhould (beſides other difficulties incident vnto the ſuſtenage of thoſe that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred ſome iealouſie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue loſt ſome friends, yea, perhaps haue increaſed the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This preſent augmentation of the forces was very requiſite; for that Attalus, about the ſame time, excuſed himſelfe vnto them, by his Embaſſadours; requeſting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome againſt Antiochus, who invaded it, or elſe that they would not take it vn-courteouſly, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They ſaid, That it was not their manner to uſe the ayde of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could alſo bee well contented to afford it; That

That they could not honeſtly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, againſt Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embaſſadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their beſt to perſwade an attonement betwene them. In ſuch louing faſhion did they now carry themſelves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded theſe termes of friendſhip, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very ſoone appeare.

T. Quintius haſting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the ſupply decreed vnto him; which conſiſted, for the moſt part, of old Souldiers, that had ſerued in Spaine and Africk. He found Vilius the old Conſul, (whom at his coming hee preſently diſcharged) & king Philip of Macedon, encamped one againſt the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apſus or Aous. It was maniſt, that either the Romans muſt fetch a compaſſe about, and ſeek their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Daſſaretians; or elſe winne, by force, that paſſage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together miſpent their time, and bene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them ſtore ſufficient, nor finde out the way. But if they could once get ouer theſe Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Theſſaly, then ſhould they enter into a plentifull Countrey; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheleſſe, the deſire of winning this paſſage, was greater than the likelihood. For the Riuer of Apſus, running along through that valley which alone was open betwene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marſh and vnpaſſable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius aſſayed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himſelfe diſappointe^d of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very eaſie, he was compelled to ſit ſtill, without doing any thing for the ſpace of forty daies.

This long time of reſt gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might bee ended by compoſition, vpon ſome reaſonable termes. He therefore ſo dealt with ſome of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that hee and the Conſull had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conſull would haue him to ſet all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the iniuries, which he had done to many people in his late warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to thoſe whom hee had ſubdued of late: but vnto ſuch, as had bene long ſubiect vnto him and his Anceſtors, hee thought it againſt all reaſon, that hee ſhould relinquish his chayne and dominion over them. He alſo ſaid, That as farre forth as it ſhould appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatſoeuer, He could well be pleaſed to make ſuch amends, as might ſeeme conuenient in the iudgement of ſome free State, that had not bene intereſted in thoſe quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not ſatisfied. There needed (he ſaid) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies bene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this alteration, when they ſhould come to particulars: and when the Conſull was required to name thoſe Towns, that he would haue to be ſet at libertie; the firſt that he named were the Theſſalians: Theſe had bene ſubiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer ſince the daies of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as ſoone as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians, the king in a rage demanded what ſharper condition hee would haue laid vpon him, had hee bene but vanquiſhed. And herewithall abruptly hee ſang away; reſuſing to heare any more of ſuch diſcourſe.

After this the Conſull ſtroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuailed againſt the difficulties of that paſſage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himſelfe, and could not reſolue what courſe to take: there came to him an Heard-man ſent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beaſts in thoſe Mountaines; was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they ſhould haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fiſt bound:

bound : and being promised a great reward, in case hee made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauielled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discouered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscouered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their iourney, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent, hee pressed as neere as he could vnto the Enemies ¹⁰ Campe, and assailed them in their strength. He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the shoutings of those that ran downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him : he made a stand at the end of foue miles, and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions : it not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, vpon eual ground. ²⁰ Neither was Philip himselfe much better perfwaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hastie retreat hee could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to vse any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuouly, that he was driuen to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him : so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his kingdome of Macedon.

The Atolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to invade Thessaly; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their seuerall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans : they foresawed not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while : but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaming after their haruest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, vailed by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault : Metropolis and Piera yielded vnto him. Rhage ⁴⁰ he besieged : and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollected his spirits, honored about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing well-neere spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Isten Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth : which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, where- ⁵⁰ in he had business, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by assault : in many were yielded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space hee had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the same time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyined with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleete. They wonne two Cities in Euboea; and afterward laid siege vnto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprize did somewhat helpe forward the Achazans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip : since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; & that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be readred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achazans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best counsell to rid their hands of him; whilst being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord : His poisoning of Aratus their old Gouverneur : His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants : together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessary euill, euen whilst they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopemen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend : then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceiue how they stood affected : and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopemen. But failing in this enterprize; and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopemen wrought so with the Achazans, that no dis- ¹⁰ course was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycliadas, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristarchus chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achazans, making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achazans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and resolute in this weightie case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achazans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, ³⁰ the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this business, admonishing the Achazans of their Alliance with the king, & of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way advance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achazans to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell, who remembering the benefites of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which hee, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and ⁴⁰ partly had vsed as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie : with the Romans (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argiues, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the ⁵⁰ Decree; which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argiues had so little thanks; that all the rest of the Achazans may bee better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solempne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discredit selfe so plainly, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philotes, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden; and finding the Multitude ready to layne with him, He easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos; together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation; so they gave him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilst as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands; if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought best, since he could not bee done, to pre dispose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamanian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Saron, in the Aegian Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian, an Embassador of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes, and some Agents for the Aetolians and Achaeans. Philip had with him some few of his own Captaines, and Cycladus, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia: Here conferred to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods: yet misdoubting some treacherie in the Aetolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans, were, That he should let all Cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoeuer he held of theirs in Illyria; and whatsoeuer about Greece by Asia he had gotten from Ptolomee then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoyled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Peraz, lying ouer against their Land, as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Helle-spont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaeans desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniufully, quarrell with him; the other had bene long his owne by their consuetudine. The Aetolians took vpon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer he held that had at any time bene theirs. Neither would they herewithall content him; but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly: corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when hee was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Aetolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be rowed neerer the shore. But they began to pite him afresh: telling him, that hee must obey his betters, unless hee were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Aetolians were. For hee said, I had he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks, desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoyle from spoyle: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Aetolia out of Aetolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betwene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides; that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, Hee said it was strange that the Aetolians should bee so careful for it, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which hee there named, were indeed no Grecians; wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make slaues of those Aetolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Aetolians well ratled vp; touching whom hee began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of setting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatest of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might become his owne dignitie. But that the Aetolians, Rhodians, and other petty Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them; as if by their great might hee should bee thereto compelled: it was, hee said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaeans hee charged with much ingratitude, reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had laden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheless hee said, that he would reder Argos vnto them; but as touching Corinth, that he would sit stiller deliberate with Titus himselfe.

Thus

Thus hee addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall, vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (hee said) was onely defensiu; they hauing bene the offerers; or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prasus, his sonne-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, he had cut downe the Grove, and pleasant walks thereabouts: what could he doe more, than send Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus hee isled the matter out; but offered neuertheless, in honour of the Romans, to giue back the Region of Peraz to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and hee ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleueed, that hee thereby sought to abridge the Aetolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely; for that he desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would giue the Achaeans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the king were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips care: who therupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to bee perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the king intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would referre himselfe to the courtisie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintius would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily preuailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in warre or peace. Further hee willed them to send their severall Embassadors to Rome, which intimating vnto the Senate, what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest hee perswaded King Aminander, to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his own Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadour of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vnder-taking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer bee effected, yf especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, & Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie; that the Senate agreed to haue it euen so as they desired. Wherefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors haue truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis & Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes? As for Coriath, whereto the Achæans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaining vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alleged, euen against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by to some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a successe had bene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

King

Philip, seeing that his Achæans had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedæmonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians & Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered, Nabis his force consisted in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tye him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philotes the kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philotes dealt with the Argiues: but found them so auerle, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with may railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philotes, without more ado, to make ouer the Town which he was ready to receiue. Philotes accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forsaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of money was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theecus, in purloining their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude; in abrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, he sent the newes to T. Quintius, and offered to ioyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Roman six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Achæans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the small conclusion of peace betwene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

6. XIII.

The battaile at Cynephele, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

T. Quintius, as soone as hee vnderstood that hee was appointed to haue Command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate, made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre, meant afterwards wholly to rely vpon himselfe.

Titus had in his Army about sixe and twenty thousand, and Philip, proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessaly, and thereupon addressed himselfe to speake him out. They had like to haue met vpon a waies, nere vnto the Citie of Phere: where the vnt-carriers on both sides discovered each other; and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer hasty, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred footes, with as many light armed foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Country about Phere was thicke set with Trees; and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles, which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue backe into Segrusia in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessaries. Titus conceived aight his meaning; and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it soe to waste the Country. There lay betwene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Nevertheless they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where hee found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouersers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip soon set in such strong supply, that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romanes therein followes had bene driven backe into their Campe. Yet all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to retire forth with his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their horse, & a number of those which were in fight.

It was altogether besides the kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and dauntfully, how the enemy fled, and how the day was his owne. If hee could see any occasion, shew like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as hee embayled his men, and climbed vp those hills, which for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynephele. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armatures were in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies, whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also liberie to choose the ground, as might serue best his advantage; forasmuch as the Romanes were quenched from all parts of the hill. None of this goodmodie hee could make, no great vantage of the youthfullnes of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, having nothing easily for his Phalanx. Nevertheless hee found some weak point, wherein to ward the strong parties of his Army, and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest, in their railing shew as they might. Whilst hee was doing this: hee perceived that the hostilities and light armatures began to strike, as being sprung vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to resolye. Masters forward to helpe them, and they no lesse hasty down vnto him for a more shewing the Romanes not farre behind them. At first most of the Romanes, who were in the hill, were wounded, so that they began to change heart, and to retire. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the Romans gaue back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these ill-ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnsucessfull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing sixe and twenty thousand in his Armie (as hee is said to haue bene equall to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine foureteene thousand Pikes; whereof he himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx, the other halfe in the left wing, ate they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing usually sixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue well-neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foote of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and fortie paces; that is, very neere a quarter of a myle in length. Such a space of open Champaigne, free from inuicible of Tretes, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments; that must of necessitye disioyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not euen where to bee found. Here at Cynoscephalæ Philip had so much room, as would only suffice for the one halfe of his men, the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming vp vnto them; nor found any difficulty in mairting those enemies, whose feete were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the coming on of the Legions, to brake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the victory complete. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans; was runne on so fast: as that himselfe with his fellowes, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand: and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindermost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed (since the first fight) were accustomed, when the battells came to ioyning, to carry their pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great incontinencie in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it serued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Darius in Melopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the fore sides of it were as so many fronts looking sundrie wayes, wayes, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the usual forme; as also at the same time hee embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexander's men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keepe their owne ground, not being able to follow vpon the Enemy, vnlesse their hindermost ranks could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselves, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The king himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euen where alike; and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when hee beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; He presently betook himselfe to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, therto to collect such as were dispersed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and siue thousand taken prisoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Aetolians; and grants truce vnto Philip, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed vnto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

THE Aetolians wonderfully vaunted themselves; and desired to haue it noysed, through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoscephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilst the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their rauenous condition; purposed to teach them better manners; by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceiued, That by vsing them with any extraordinary honour, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Aetolians much more vehemently; than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battaile Titus made hast vnto Larissa, a citie of Thessalie: which hee presently tooke. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were here kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersity, he forgot not to prouide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that he gaue them as already lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the town of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet: and very soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Aetolians euer true to Philip, gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynoscephalæ. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Peris, a Region of the Continent ouer against the Island; whereof they had demanded restitution in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, & some helpe which they borrowed of the Achæans & other their friends, gaue battell to Dinocrates the kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victory, & consequently recovered the whole Prouince. Hee angred Philip worse than all this; that the Cardians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdome; wasting and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all hast of sixe thousand foot and siue hundred horse: wherewith coming vpon them, hee draue them with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hauing out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yeeld vnto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Lamachus and Demosthenes, with Cleodemus the banished Athenian, in whom he reposed much confidence, and advisors vnto him. These had conference a long while in private, with him and some of his Roman Colonels, by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dissuaded. It seemed that they had Commission, to referre all vnto his owne discretion, as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto him a Truce for fiftene dayes: in which time, the king himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General. In the mean season many suspicious rumours went of him, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the king, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Aetolians were chiefe authors, who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profited them a wrong way, iudged alike of all men to elfe. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates, willing them to haue their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Fempe, where the Treaty should bee held. There when they were assembled, they entered into consultation before the kings arrivall; what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, & for euery estate in particular. The peere king Aminander besought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him; and considering his weakenesse which he confesse, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Aetolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their own good, and had willed them to deliuer their minds freely added; That in the meane of the purpose which he had in hand, he was vterly persuaded: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other way to be had of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate or people of Rome, or with the faile promises made by him himselfe vnto the Greeks, than the taking of Philip quid out of his kingdom. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good nature of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held; for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vtter destruction of any king, or Nation at such times as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it matter of necessity to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was onely an aduancement to moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece, it was the faile expedient, that the kingdom of Macedonia should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be vtterly destroyed: forasmuch as it serued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other sauage Nations, which would soone ouerflow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore, he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, which were with him pressed him in the former Treaty, then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phanias, another of the Aetolians, to say, that all was come to nothing, for that too long Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no lesse than he had done already before. But Titus interrupted him, & bid him leaue his babbling, saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip were hee neuer so desirous should he sent forth nor haue it in his power to deliuer the Greeks, nor could he do so but by a way, which he had found out already.

The next day King Philip came wither, whom Titus welcomed friendly, and suffering him to come himselfe that night to his Countell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that he had before required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phanias the Aetolian, insuluing ouer him, said it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length giue up to the Aetolians, & many of towne (which he there named) to deliuer him. He said, whether he would, or no, it was his will, that they might take what they pleased. But Titus interposing him selfe, said it should be otherwise, if there were any Aetolian towne, and should beall freed from them and destroyed, which was long agoe had refused to committe selfe to the charge of the Romans, & therefore should now be giuen to the Aetolians. Hereat Philip was much offended, that it was so great an injury, which hee demanded of the Townes

Townes that had sometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betwene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had bene such a condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Aetolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Aetolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these angry passages between the Roman and the Aetolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure, since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to giue them liberty, though they had stood out against him, euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alledged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motive, euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alleging frivolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betwene the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to what soeuer was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side, and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the king would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People: by whose foueraigne authority it was concluded, that Peace should be granted vnto the king. So tenne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had bene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, that Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine haue retained those three important Cities, of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achaeans; and all the other Greek townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, he should withdraw his garrisons out of all the Greek townes which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, reseruing to himselfe onely fise of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatnesse, wherein sixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following, by euen portions. Hereto Linus adds, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedonia, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already deliuered to Titus, together with his younger son Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as hee lately sent his Embassadors to Rome when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with those foure hundred talents, was giuen for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias king of Bythnia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip, to gratifie this Bythnian his son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, & permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their nation did. What effect effect their letters wrought, it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Proculus to their will.

All Greece reioycied at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Aetolians found themselves agreed that they were vterly neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Boeotians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with to his Armie, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to haue a hand in the execution, yet neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Boeotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for five hundred soldi-ers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which hee would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Herewithall he falls to wasting their Country; and besiegeth two such townes of theirs, as did seeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians, (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet befought him rather to grant peace vnto the Boeotians) prevailed so far with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian, others greatly doubting that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Aetolian would haue been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumours, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect; That the Senate and people of Rome, & Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, hauing vanquished king Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their own Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Euboeans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, & Perrhæians. The suddenesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendered now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greekes, was like to be much more auailable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue bene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in the Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagesianax and Lysanck, King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with warre: as also to reuert whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Army into Europe;

adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long; to take with him further concerning those points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gaue vnto the Etolians, whom they thought it no wisdom to offend: ouermuch being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thebans, all saue the town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had bene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Etolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Etolians contended very earnestly about Pharsallus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and reiected vnto the Senate: for howsoeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as if they were in despight of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Hæreal: so the Corinthians were made free and deed (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinth for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common wealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleurarus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Antiochus were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this warre, to reigne in them & the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Achæanians. The Rhodians had bene their owne Caruets. Antiochus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreeus and Eretria, in the Ile of Euboea, to his sonne and successor King Emmenus. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Bubæans, should be suffered to enjoy their libertie. Orestis, a little Prouince of the kingdom of Macedonia, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These busineses being dispatched: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the warre with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and propriety. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell, and about vnto others, to pre-dispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this king the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents deale and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

What Rises of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomie, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, king of Asia and Syria, dyed in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is said) beene warned before by an Oracle, to be wile of Argos; as the fatal place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath bene preferred, or any mischief auoyded, by the predictions of such Diuellish Oracles. Rather I beleue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene antedated by their Priests or by others, which deuised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearly beloued of his Father: who surrendered vnto him his owne wife Stratonice, when hee vnderstood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomie Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vntreuged by this his Successor:

But

But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words, containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceramus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Solenus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queene Stratonice in his Fathers life; yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue urged him. Afterwards hee had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomachus King of Bithynia. Also Lycarion and Lemnonius, Kings or Captaines of the Gauls, were set vpon him by the fame Nicomachus. With these hee fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all aduantage against him, yet by the terrour of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he won the Victory. He tooke in hand an enterprize against Ptolomie Philadelphus: but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Assyria; the fame, which hath since been excellently falsified by the Frier Annius. Hee left behinde him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the king of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the kingdomes of the Greekes, when he had reigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen to him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Hee held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecie of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the king of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomie Philadelphus was a great loue of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arifina) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that race. It was He, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, He sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bene very great: for he had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slavery throughout all Egypt; and hee had sent vnto the Temple of God in Ierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolomie caused to be translated into Greek, by seuentie two of the most graue & learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuante, Iesus the sonne of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to haue bene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Ianfenius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Josephus affirms) by Arifinus that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolomie Philadelphus was king; reckoning the time wherein he ioyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had bene in his former yeeres: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bin referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowne, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne error. Hee was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entered into League with the Romans: as also of his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laudine, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomie. After his second marriage, he vsed his first wife with no better regard, than if she had bene his Concubine. Laudine hated him for this: yet aduancured not to seeke reuenge vntill her owne sonne Selenus Callinicus was of ability to be king. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolomie Philadelphus: at what time the poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Selenus her son, murdered him together with a sonne that he had borne to her, when Antiochus was in Rome, than Antiochus himselfe. Togeth with the young Prince hee killed; a while since the Sanctuary at Delphes: and then out of the same place, Callinicus prepared to come backe, but her brother Selenus intercepted him, and killed him. Callinicus was a young man, who was an Albanus, though too late, for the warre was before Caluoc and Callinicus as yet had not been known to the world. Antiochus such a man, Selenus Callinicus succeeded vnto his Father, that had suffered grieues becomming, began his reigne. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discouraged in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue bene an euen thing, if Selenus Callinicus, who came against him, had not bene drawn backe in his owne Countrey, by his shone. Commotions there in hand, for that were not then in hand, hee was against Selenus, in defence of their Countrey: but rather they sided with the Egyptian, who took the Selenus and kings women, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Selenus, being freed from this iniunction, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Selenus Callinicus into Egypt, went about a dangerous peace of warre, euen to make warre vpon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; yet as in hand him much better, by well-defecting to haue changed their hated into loue. A great fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning, whereof he was at such charges, that he feared lest himselfe, any other hope, if that should miserie, Antiochus hee embarked himselfe, and putting to Sea, did inuade with such a tempest, as he couered all the land, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This Antiochus, hauing left him nothing whole in a manner than his naked body, turned neuer the least to his great good, as upon after it seemed. For when his Subjects understood, what for the gods (as they conceived) he had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate, and, presuming that hee would therefore become a new man, offered vnto him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with such spirit, as thinking himselfe well enough able to deal with the Egyptian, he made ready a mighty Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better of Land than it had bene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Selenus in a great battaile: whence hee escaped hardly, no better attended than after his late shipwracke. Having therefore backe to Antiochus, and fearing that the enemy would come to his borders, he wrote vnto his brother Antiochus theos, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed, and promising recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeeres old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee leuied a mighty Armie of the Gauls; where with he set forward to helpe his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Herof Ptolomie being advertised: and hauing no desire to put himselfe in a danger more than he needed, heeooke Tuce with Selenus for tenne yeeres. No longer was Selenus freed from this care of the Egyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came vnto him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Antiochus was vanquished againe, and fled himselfe, with few about him, that he was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. This did Gods iudice take reuenge of those murders by which the Crowne was purchased; and killed (as might haue bene thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brother's death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire; but the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were grader than He. For when hee led them against Eumenes King of Pergame, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne, these perfidious Barbariansooke counsaile against him, and desired how to stripe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them, it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to them, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus, and enforced him to take some little summe of money, as if he had bene their Prisoner. Neither were they so contented, but made him enter into such a composition with them, as ended his little hope of honour. In the meane while Selenus had gathered an Army, and repaired once more to try his fortune against his brother. Hearing of this, though the reason for himselfe, to make his profit of their misdeeds, Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten; which is no great marvel, since hee had gathered more to him, no less force of the Gauls his own soldiers, than than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Antiochus wonne much in Asia, whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought between the brethren, Selucus had the upper hand. And Antiochus fled into the Thrace (which surname was given him, because he sought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as farre as hee could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Having fetched a great compass through Mesopotamia and Armenia, he fell in length in Cardagoria, where his father-in-law King Antiochus took him vp. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew, but with a meaning to betray him. This he soone perceived: and therefore, betooke him to his wings againe, though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to throw himselfe upon Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what euill he had meant vnto Selucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. In this hee can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Antiochus. Wherefore he layd him vp in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of the eues, by whom he was murdered. Neere about the same time died Selucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a iourney against Aspas founder of the Parthian kingdome: where in his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Aspas dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way given him royall entertainment; but in returning home, he bracke his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeeres. He had to wife Ladias the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Capitaines: which was father vnto that Aspas, who making his aduantage of this affliction, became shortly after (as he styled himselfe) a king, though rather indeede; a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Ladias he had two sonnes; Selucus the third, surnamed Euergetes; and Antiochus the third, called after wards the Great.

Selucus Cerdonius reigned onely three yeeres; in which time he made warre vpon Antiochus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of body through sicknesse, and in want of money, he could nor keepe his limits of warre in good order: and finally hee was slaine by treason of Nicanor and Apatorus a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Antiochus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus the brother of Selucus, being then a Child.

II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolemie Euergetes, and Philopator Kings of Egypt, warre betweene Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo; an expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian warre: with the passages betweene the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemie, and Peace concluded. Of Achaeus, and his rebellion; his greatnesse, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians; some of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fiftene yeeres old, when hee began his reigne, which lasted sixe and thirty yeeres. In his Minortie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which inuaded all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings: faithfull seruants. This wilde quality in a Counsellour of such great place, how harmful it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe, the successe of things will shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Prochus Philopator, a young Boy likewise, as hath else where been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who reliqued Antiochus and the Achaeans: who afterwards took part with Cleomenes, and lovingly entertained him, when hee was chased out of Greece by Antiochus Gnarus. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene, by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Mithridates. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians: for so much for the great spoyle which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made warre vpon the Iewes, for that Antiochus their high Priest, out of more courteousnesse of money refused to pay vnto him his yearly tribute of 200 talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Isidorus a Iew, to whom afterwards hee let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him in those parts of Syria which he held. For Coele Syria, with Palestine and all those parts of the Countrey that lay neere vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battell at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the trouble some and vnhappy reigne of Selenus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucids, were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecies before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned sixe and twenty yeeres; and dyed towards the end of the hundred thirtieth and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Isidorus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was king. It may therefore be, That either this king reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty yeeres, were the yeeres of Isidorus his owne age; if nor perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did other whiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsaile, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptians; for the recouerie of Coele Syria and the Countreies adioyning. This counsaile was very vnseasonably giuen, when Molo, the kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrey. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stiffly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captaine, other Captaines that were faithfull, whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a king. No man durst gaine say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achazan, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebel, whilst in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the kings expedition into Coele Syria. The king hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Deserts into the Vallie of Masfias, betweene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodorus an Aetolian, that serued vnder Ptolemie. So he continued the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenatas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his iourney, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; receiued many aduertisements by such as fled ouer vnto him from the Enemy. That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commanders to beare armes against their king. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so bee stopped, hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leauing all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne souldiers; or whether thereby to deceiue his enemy; the great follie of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather he commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against the iourney, which he intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which hee had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heauy with the wine and other good cheere, that they had spent at supper. So Xenarchus and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Mala: the Captaines flying thence, to save their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebells marched vnto Seleucia, which he presently tooke: and, mastering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrey downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia, Hee hastned vnto Susa; where at his first comming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this businesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marfyas, filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of Coelosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soone after slain, by the practise of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counsaile giuen, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney against Mala, the name and precence of the King was more available, than any oddes which he had of the Rebells in strength. Mala distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, Hee was discovered by some that fled out from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Mala, vpon confidence which he had that many would resolute vnto him. Neither was he decelued in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Ensignes, but all the leffwing of the enemy, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forthwith as soone as euer they had sight of the kings person; and were ready to doe him seruice against Mala. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Mala shortned the worke, by killing himselfe, as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vse he could, of her bountifull disposition while it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, He iudged it conuenient to visit his Frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counsailler Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthning his owne Gouernement. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; hauing the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betwene the Caspian & Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull; and therefore yielded vnto whatsoeuer conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly vnto the kings owne life. Antiochus beleued this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for feare of him to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to haue vsed so much art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoeuer he seemed gracious whilst he was aliue: yet they that for feare had bene most obsequious to him him, whilst he were in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved; when once they were secure of him: Yea; his wife and children lying then at Apamæ, were stoned to death by the wifes and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that they had bene concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a king. His purpose was to haue invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus's his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and studied to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be vnardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Coelosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. Hee began with Seleucia a very strong City neere to the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long hee wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great, who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Evergetes hauing lately won it, might if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their own; than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Atolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Coelosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now grown sorry, that he had vsed so much faith & diligence, in seruice of an vnthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to haue regard to his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus the Cities of Tyrus & Ptolemais. Whilst he was dealing about this treason, and had already sent messengers to king Antiochus; his practice was detected & he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hastning to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good flecte of the Egyptian kings that was in those Haues; but of so many other Townes in that Countrey, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Egypt it selfe. Agathocles and Socibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safety of his kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the war; and neuertheless, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heat of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, & Cyzicus, as likewise from the Atolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Socibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsaillers perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get, for money, a sufficient number of the greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouernours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, & other Embassadours, coming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being at decelued, by the cunning of Agathocles & his fellows: Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not winne: & being desirous to refresh himselfe & his Armie in Seleucia, during the winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a truce for foure moneths, moneths, with promise that hee would be ready to hearken vnto equal Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as hee would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilest he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would haue used, He vsed himselfe as presuming, that when time of the yeere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemie provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse, he gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell, which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. He said, that it was agreed betwene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonius, should bee giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Iplu. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Cœlosyria, and the Provinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Province of Babylon, and the Countreies about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their dispute, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needs haue Achæus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates. But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebelle into protection, and seek to ioyne him in Confederacie with his own Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuerthelesse hee draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourney, wonne so many places, that he greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiaticques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinoe his Sister and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deeds of his Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they been fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the aduantage of those beasts, Hee draue the Enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battaile, and won the victory; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field, about seuentie thousand foot, and fixe thousand horse; whereof though hee lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not foure hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achæus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie to vex himselfe thus with the tedious businesse of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing staid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror, to the great admiration of his subjects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the league betwene these two Kings: or if hee had beene been included therein, yet would not the Egyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebelle had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vanage of some opportunitie: but Cousin geriman to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, that King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likely-hoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betwene sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian: He was not onely slothfull, but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late expedition; beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenarie Greekes, which had hitherto kept them in straight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betwene the king and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet king Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue bene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in luccouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, Hee had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebelle, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sauve, was in like manner situate vpon steepe Rockes, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottom, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, vsed to be throwne. Now it was obscured by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch vpon the walles, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Hereof he informed the king: who approued his iudgement, & gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as hee desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The success was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and (whilest a generall assault was made) entred the towne in that part; which was at other times vnguarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Crasus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse manie ages past; and therefore out of memorie, Achæus held still the Castle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was verie well stored with all necessaries; & manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the usual tediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Batrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had crested kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incherched. But hee thought it not safe, to let Achais breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptoleme the Egyptian, and good friends vnto Achais; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appeare in the Countreyes vnder Taurus, he would soone haue an Arme at command, and bee strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rocks, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receiue at the hands of Ptoleme, as well as of Antiochus to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vnderooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to effect, that they wrote vnto Achais, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found meane to conueigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achais held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie Characters, or Chiphers, wherewith none saue he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained deuiſe of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, hee was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achais found, by examination, heartily affected vnto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus to whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus, vnder whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sardes. Neuertheleſſe other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduenture. When the messenger had therefore passed to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achais, & conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue only by Bolis and Cambylus, which were Cretans, and as all their Countreimen, *some few excepted, haue bene, and still are) false knaues. Thesetwo held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius obserues it, rightly Critical: neither concerning the safety of him whose delucy they vnderooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betwene them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achais vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration anſwerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Achais well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achais thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very priuie audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptoleme whom he had long serued; He accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his coming thither, Hee was louingly entertained, yet questioned at large by Achais, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discoursed so well, and with such gravity; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or iudgement. Hee was an olde Souldiour, had long bene a Captaine vnder Ptoleme, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other countreimen of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But againe all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduenture stirred vp some diffidence. Achais therefore dealt wisely, and sayde, That he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that hee meant to send away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when he receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelyhood of the enterprife, then would he issue forth himselfe. Hereby heooke order, not to comit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he

* Among these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Eudamion, son to Achais a Cretan who in one of his late flameselle Libels, wherein hee aduoceth our King, Religion, and Country, with all the good & worthy men whom he could learne the names, hath, by insinuating in some twice, belied me in calling me a Puritan, and one that haue bene dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to be all spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Architect of Leuesen regarded whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Cretisme no lesse voluminous, than he in multiplicity of name is beyond any the Cretans in other times, that were alwaies 7 yeers, enill brasse, and slow beliers.

he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, That he had to doe with one, whose hauey could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus. That if Achais came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; & Bolis following behinde, should haue an eye vpon Achais to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rear. Achais made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Lepidee, and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed foure of his speciall friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greck tongue; speaking & anſwering as need should require, for all as if the rest had bene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuiſing vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to miserie any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achais, or whether Achais himselfe were there. The way was very vtcalic, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in diuers places: and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achais; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that he was the man: and so by their vnseasonable duty, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whistled, & presently clasped Achais about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who fate vp watching in his Pavilion, expecting the euent. The fight of Achais, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the king, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, Hee condemned Achais to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pitty towards this vnhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him those teares: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traiour, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverbe, A vntraydor dos alleuſos. The death of Achais brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Prouinces, after the death of Alexander; the Governement ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose posterity they continued vntill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slaine by the Gaules; did stirre vp Asaces, a Noble man of the Countrey, to seeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebell. So hee slue the kings Lieutenant; made himselfe king of the Parthians and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battaile, whom hee royally entertained and dismissed. Hereby hee wonne reputation as a lawfull king: and by good gouernement of his Countrey, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his Subjects, that his name was continued vnto his successors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, & that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Badrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucide beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that that they durst not meete him in plaine field; but kept themselves in woods, for places of strength, and defended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistance they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well fortified, as he needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods & Streights betwene their mountaines, it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often trispy against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and glieway vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Asiaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelity of his owne subiects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Deserts, would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbarane in Media, to giue over the iourney, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: Hee caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his enemy must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew himselfe out of the way, suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some victorie obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Asiaces was nothing strongly prouided for the war. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe City of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Asiaces at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battaile. The issue thereof was such as gaue to neither of the kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asiaces craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subiect.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeede had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but hauing gotten the kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a battaile by the Riuer Arius, where he had the victory. But the victory was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which he gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. Hee was thought that day to haue demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His horse was slaine vnder him; and he himselfe received a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe vnto the furthestmost parts of his kingdom, and afterwards protracted the warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betwene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was vnjustly vsurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Prouinces that lay behinde them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little auailable vnto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to giue him in marriage, one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdom, causing him neuerthelesse to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a iourney ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagastus, king of the Indians, the society that had bene betwene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subiect vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Emmenes in his warre against Antigenus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigenus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was ouer-busied in a great ciuil warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrey-men to Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him, as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a king. Finally hee got vnto himselfe (hauing an Armie of sixe hundred thousand men) if not all India; yet as much of it as had bene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe; ere Selenus Nicator could finde leisure to call him to account. Neither did He faile, or humble himselfe, at the coming of Selenus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed; that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and amity with him, taking onely a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdoms, was continued by some Offices of loue betwene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased therevpon, by the Indian king, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receiue. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forward, in many generations, any businesse worthy of remembrance with the Westerne Countreys. The posteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdom vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, He said, That He had command ouer sixe hundred kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdom, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagastus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hinder side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans, whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in seeming.

The lewd reigne of Ptolemie Philopator in Egypt: with the tragick end of his favorites; when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to marrie on the young prince Ptolemie Epiphanes, the son of Philopator. His irresolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. Hee seeks to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly show to him; intending neuerthelesse to haue warre with him. His doing against the Hellesponts; when the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

THIS expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe a while; and studie which way to conuert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died; leauing his son Ptolemie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdom, vnlike by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemie surnamed Philopator, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname giuen him in meere derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeeres, being newly past, his childhood when he began to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beaulinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof hee could bee accused. Hauing woone the battaile at Raphiah, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; and was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduentured her selfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vndertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant shippes off his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, & Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Onchicris a filthy Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philopator died; who hauing reigned seuenteen yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes, a child of three yeeres old, begotten on Agathoclea that was his sister and wife. After the kings death, Agathoclea began to take vpon him; as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedonians which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemie the first, and

and would not be accounted Egyptians, as neither would the Kings themselves, and bringing forth vnto them his son Agathocles, with the young King in his armes, began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the kingdom did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great neede was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traitorously went about to lift the Diademe vpon his own head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, to and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake, but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And to brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly been his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he disliked. He hailed out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus, and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meete in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes, where: in they had conceived extreame hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present Iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were some what also moued with feare of harme, which, in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernement, as afterwards he proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vtore. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him, & deliuered him vnto a follower of his own, to be executed by torture. This poore Souldier was carried into an inner room of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whilst the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minist' of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room, leaving Maeragenes the Souldier alone by himselfe, and the doores open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conuerged himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple there by at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turke Ianizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus bene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to forge the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Lawd Ocanus fled into a Temple, his sonne and Daughter stayed in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streets, as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice, being them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus, who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolomie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what part he could of the chilles estate. But it happened well, that Ptolomie Philadelphus in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two Kings, who though they secretly maligne on the other, yet had entered into covenants to diuide betwene them all all that belonged vnto this Orphan, whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt, especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian, He was very soone found buckled, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Atolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that he was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip. As hee bene shewed before. As for Scopas, He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie, where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Iewes, who seeme to haue yielded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long ere all these victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cyrenosephaly, Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bin lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forebear to invade; and gaue it out, that hee meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolomie: either, hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrey would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this young child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that hee was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrells betwene Antiochus, Philip, and the Greeks, promised to afford him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yield him obedience. Another while, leaving Egypt alone, he was about to make inuasion vpon Antiochus his kingdom; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, and desisted from that enterprize. Having thus fare gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity betwene him and them. It is not lightly to be overlooked, That these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly bee troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Towns elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolomie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their kingdoms, hee offered one of his daughters to Ptolomie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendship, at one and the same time, when hee fought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoever it was, Hee sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them there to stay for him; whilst hee himselfe with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilst the warre of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to understand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioine with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet hee tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadors; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire, to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appeare to haue been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were so informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolomie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well, for that they had euer been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolomies. They therefore, in this time of necessity, gaue what aide they could vnto all the subiects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did king Enmenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed between Antiochus and the Romans. For when king Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: He excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Phileterus, his brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his overthrow, so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mighty neighbour, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he took such order as he thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampfacus to obedience; that had vsurped their liberty, and obstinately stroue to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed vnto the Hellespont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side, and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lyfymachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroyed, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman war. The Aetolians objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lyfymachia, by thrusting therinto a garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his garrison did not oppress the town, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good & substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such, might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lyfymachia at his comming thither. For the town was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the king tooke order to haue it re-edified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants, and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a iourney in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Army, leauing the other halfe to repair the Citie. These paines he tooke, partly in regard of the conuenient situation, & former glory of Lyfymachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer & establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of king Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King Antiochus. The Aetolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Achians, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph, Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

FOR the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprize of the Kings about Lyfymachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him, because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans; then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, requited as hath bin shewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-proffessed amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visite King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the businesse: wherein left T. Quintius, with his ten Assisants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging, L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deale with the king about those controuersies, that were between him and Ptolomie. What other priuate instructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Tarentius, hauing bin sent by Titus, were at Lyfymachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Leontulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesias and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolomie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Heereunto he added, and that very earnestly; That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and hee done nothing? Further he warned the king, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally He demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourney there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre vpon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That hee wondred why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking

upon the matters of Asia: wherewith hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as hee, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his coming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, & the recovery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace & Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betwene him and the other Kings, had bene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had bene seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countreies, were hindered by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia, either against the free cities, or against the king of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities, holding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolomie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampfacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in, beganne a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the king before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betwene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, & thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Gallo-Greeks, pretend onely the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greeks an opinion of their iustice, forbeare the occasion of making themselves great. The king on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolomie was dead. Hereof neither the king, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him therof, and set the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolomie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, & prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the king forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintred: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian, gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weak excuses. In like manner some of the Greeks were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians, That

That constantly & faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their Victory ouer Philip, but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate, and to chase out of their citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late excrcised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this their power with moderation; but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the citie, Hannibal was chosen Prator. By vertue of which Office, though he was superiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not been their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annuall Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must bee accountable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Quaestors, or officers of the Tresurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quaestor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerser Faction (as Hannibal); and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But hee had not to doe with such a tame Prator, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publique assembly of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornnesse of this Quaestor had bene; but how vsufferable the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbribed power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; hee forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man bee continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had bene passed, before he passed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps haue bene in the power of Hannibal, to haue brought him vnto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation laid vpon the whole Commonaltie, as wanting money in their publique Tresurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Tresurie, by wayes and meanes whatsoeuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Tresurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof hee made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the value of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extreemely, as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once, euen when they thought themselves to haue been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well crye out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beast, which would neuer be tamed: That secret meslages past betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, euery one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publicke notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witness against him, the man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vsed their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such aduantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Sernilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius 20 Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controuerfies, betweene the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had hee a Ship furnished with all things needfull: as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So Hee bade Africke farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; hee found there in the Hauen some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them began to enquire, whither hee was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre: and that hee intended there in the Island to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needes hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted court, Hee made 40 them bring thither all their sailes and yards to be vsed in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleepe: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being buisied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly considered. Some ghesied aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where hee had bene scene: and then the Roman Embassadors, hauing none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that Hee fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity betweene their Cities, thought themselves to haue interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, adding the King, departed, visited his son in Daphne: who friendly welcomed med him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly reioyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discouerie of their impotent malice, in chiding him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiers of base Afaticques; as it had bin by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiceable and skillfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions where-in he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to auoid the war; then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeede that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes; vnlesse by mere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Aetolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late bene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnaduised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to 30 right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of war with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Aetolians were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vain libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliuerers had laid heauy fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeede no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay, in accomplishment of that which 40 was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus; Hee made it his daily fault, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, such as it was, might bee confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuerthelesse, T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to scize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, Hee retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus; by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embassadors, that had bene sent ouer to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherein he should find not onely the Aetolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, ready to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intenuie to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment; whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorry; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had warre with Philip; and had further bene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achæans; neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, wheron to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the war with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in subiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duely to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to bee vnderaken; or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as hee could deuise. Hee gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pitié it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination, to foretell what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Euery one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their City had bene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honour they were now so farre of, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would leade all the rest into seruitude. Then spake Hee against the Achæans, Clients that had bene a long time vnto the Macedonian, and fouldiers of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, He said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes bene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth, hauing bene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Ætolians themselves did promise, & would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece; that was now at vnitie. These words had bene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparant, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Ætolians; as did their owne rauentous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worfe would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had bene couenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoyle of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achæans, cry out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Ætolian theues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, Hee was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had bene sent vnto him from Rome, to bee his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Naue, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remoued the Ætolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedæmonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues, more bold than wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedæmonians that held their Towne, meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neere, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Ætolians to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were quiet. But there was no stir within the Walls: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedæmon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the Warre was made, pitié it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Fiuie thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyranny was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an assembly: and compassing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, hee said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before-hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preferue not only the City and his owne person from danger, but them also for the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Hereupon hee cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noyed abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortal crime to bee suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto some poore wretches : whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and flaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens : He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a fallie : wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first ; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta : but ouer-ran the Countrey ; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with king Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid siege vnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Town that Nabis had. Like-ly they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by trea-son. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritie : whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other fin-ning what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, flue the Traitor ; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum : this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place ; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne in law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment, with a thousand Souldi-ours Mercenarie, and two thousand Argiues : it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants pur- pose, to relieue Gyttheum : which he thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus : re-questing onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe : prouing, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments ; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could object vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon hee in-ferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleaged, they ought to make warre vpon him ; since Argos, and all other their al-legations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from en-tring into that League with him, which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to bee on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie, and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him ; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alleaged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans : That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip ; when he was their enemy, not onely in League, but also in affinity : and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malca. Now touching this Pyracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mention- ed, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre : it may seeme to haue bene objected, onely by way of Comple-ment, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very fruio- lous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip : they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant ; and there- fore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristonius, the Prator of the Achans, very well perceived : who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their own iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yett their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong : framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate ; & to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it with- out hazzard : alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour- cities, and therein committed great outrages ; yet were afterwards contented to surren- der their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happinesse, as priuate men. Thus they discouered vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Ar- gos ; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, wherewith the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta : they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depen- ding ; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grie- uous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonians to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete ; no, nor to make any Confederacies ; nor warre, either in that Island or else where ; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands ; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barks ; besides many other troublesome iniunctions ; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yearly, for eight yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants hee demanded fise hostages, such as he himselfe should name ; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice : then had it bene enough, if not more than enough, to take Ar- gos from him ; which he himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie : then should this enterprife, when once it was taken in hand, haue bin prosecuted vnto the very vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held : as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselves by the spoyle of one that had not offended them : nor pleasing to the Achans, who iudged it euer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus : so did it minnish vnto the Ætolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descen- ded of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of these Countreies or Towns in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors : it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon ; once the most famous Citie among all the Greeks, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday : and hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnmereifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinity of the Macedonian king, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But finally he dealt with the Macedonian : and finally was hee dealt with by those, to whom hee did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him ; saue onely that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe ; hauing among them Agesipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a young child was driuen out by Lycurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no prouision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates ; but onely leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be so contented, to liue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore hee forbore to giue consent vnto these demands : and sustained an assault or two ; hoping belike that the enemies would soone bee wearie. But his fearfull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had bene propounded, hee deliuered the hostages ; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans faire more wicked than himselfe ; and was ready vpon the first aduantage, to doe them all the mischief that he could.

The Argiues had heard news that Lacedæmon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison ; which was much weakened, by the remooue of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should set their hands to the get- ting of it ; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfully welcommed. Hee was deferuently acknow- ledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without staying for him : and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Nemean games ; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achæia ; whereby the Achæans were not more strengthened, than the Argiues themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vncynere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts, and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly he gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaïans, withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, & promising to do the like (which very soone he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what lyers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With ioyfull acclamations did the Greeks testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had bene fold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was vrged, left therein behinde him the memory of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ielousie & suspicion of any euill meaning. At his comming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph, which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued; as being set out with the spoyle of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought, some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteen Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintus, and the ten that had bin his Counsaillers; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betwene the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equal termes of aduantage; or betwene those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Conenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had bene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand, and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betwene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kinde, was the league & friendship that had bene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia hee should set at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintus answered, that since they went so distinctly to worke, Hee would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choyce whether to accept: Either that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampacis, or any other Asiaticques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that fought their loue, and had neuer done them iniury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the City of Lyfimaquia, whercon of late he had bene at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundation, and repeopling it with Inhabitants, that had all bene dispersed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alledged: saying, That Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were faire the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at liberty those Towns, which the King would oppress and hold in subiection: especially since those Towns were of Greekish bloud and language, and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon haue left Antiochus king of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had bin already with the King at Lyfimaquia; by whom they might receiue a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintus and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long warres which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Massinissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for iustice in vaine.

THE Insubrians, Boians, & other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians, made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italy, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be their Leader vnto them all, as hath bene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, Armes, grew to bee such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stir alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpinia, now called Lumbardie; it hath bin long since rehearsed between the first and second Punicke Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armes abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre, had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout nation, light and swift of bodie, well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken nor belied. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might give contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse & military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaule, to their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing & spoyling the Territories of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seemes to haue bin grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages: To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of iniuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, doe vse commonly this answer, It hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Disputes ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their owne Countrie they did little harme: not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, save on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Ox-hide; & the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer provided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had vnited themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had beene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vied them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which which they raised vpon the whole Countrie; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise the Romans, vying the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too far distant, and withal too great, for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armes in the Countrie, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captaines, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie; though seldome in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians, safely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subiection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted five yeeres. This victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre; which after five yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsull, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither two Prators, and with each of them some two Legions. These did some what: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consull the yeere following, and sent into that Prouince; found at his coming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that otherstooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victory vpon the chieftest of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a iourney against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore, disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves for very griefe. Hearing of this; and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse, He prayed them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the walls of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countreimen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a iest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the warre to good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublefome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of war, which might well be termed the Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vsfull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skillfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any businesse either priuate or publike. Many bookes he wrote: whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his Houle. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great synceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, he was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore & sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galla vnto the People. So began the Nobility of Caro his familie; which ended in his great grand-child M. Caro the Vtican: one, that being of like vertue and seruencie, had all his good purposes dash't, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and Greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish warres, after Caro his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere to were sent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into Governments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirtie thousand Spaniards in a battell; another tooke little Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spaine required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, vntill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countreies to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine Houle promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves & their obedient Citie: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidians challenged; & by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. Hee had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any warre, without leaue obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had bene impartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrey: Masaniissa himselfe, now very lately pursuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise bene questionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had where-with to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. He gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspition of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebelle; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had alwayes, he said, bene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime vnto the Numidian kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into small thongs. Whatseuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto such vsurpers, the Countrey sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong Armie should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from stirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their final destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the utmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans by whom they held themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gythium, and wasteth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopœmen, in advantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, ioynes with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize vpon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perswasions annex themselves to the Achaians.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed; it grieved much the Ætolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoyle of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not onely disappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well haue sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were, not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnseparable wrong. Wherefore they deuided, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowful knowledge of the difference, between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make war vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyne altogether in a new Confederacy: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far surmount those of the Romans, Achaians, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Ætolians tooke in hand; and well becomming them, for they were great daunters. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perswasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irrelolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither as Philip had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege vnto Gythium; that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaians, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duty: neither would they haue staied long from repressing his violence by open Warre; had not some of them thought it wisdome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintim, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilist thus they spent time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintim to let all alone, and to waite for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iust cause of complaint, by wakening their owne Territorie.

Philopemen was then Prætor of the Achæans, who had long bin absent in Crete; making war there for his mindes sake & recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themselves, giuing him leaue to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all hastes to relieue Gytheum by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should be lost, if to heved any delay. But Philopemen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadrirème Gallie his Admirall, that had fourecore yeeres agoe bene counted a gallant vessell, in the Naue of Antigonius Gonnatus. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with their wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saued themselves with what speed they could. But Philopemen was not herewith daunted. If hee had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gytheum, to stop the Achæans if they should invade the Countrey. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopemen came vnexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, saue a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gytheum. It was not expected that Nabis would haue bene ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gytheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in the Rere. They marched therefore almost feelest, in a long Troupe reaching some five miles; hauing their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopemen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countrey about him; and to discouise, what might befall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand: what peece of ground it were meet for him to seize vpon: and in what manner he might best doe it: in what fort he should order his men: where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Guard: in what fort encampe himselfe: and which way march the day following. By such continual meditation, Hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke, whereto the Achæans lay the neerer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopemen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; wherein to the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goeto the Tyrant; as a fugitiue, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get between him and Lacedæmon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recouerie of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to stay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart; thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopemen was not so to be beguiled. Hee easily wonne the Campe, and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus disperfed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopemen conceived a right, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when hee had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilist it was day, He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, & occupied the two most ordinary passages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopemen Campe great store of lights, thought that all had bene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty dayes together after this, did Philopemen wast the Countrey round about, whilist Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, & T. Quintim among them, labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus & Nabis, whom they knew to bee solicited by the Etolians. Very faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoeuer hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receiue other fauours at their hands; and regaine possessions of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilist their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolome and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their setting forth. So one thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Liuius rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discouered often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspicion wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vtue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him in suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceiued this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recouered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the king not to regard any vaine fumes: but to know thus much, That so long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Etolians, and their friends, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had tooften dealt with Antiochus, vanishing much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip; that finally they vnailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, vnles he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own forces to the vttermost : as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and himselfe, without helpe from any ; save onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the king Antiochus that animated them to resolution : the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neerer at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small piece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panatholium, or great Assembly of the Nation ; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which to the ruine of the Country, the Romans, and king Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Matter : the *Ætoli*ans, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming * the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might docto send Embassadours to Rome, that should either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired : than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the king, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired, either as their right, or els by way of fauour. For with such Terms had they been satisfied once already: and were by the Senate reiectcd vnto Titus : who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction ; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This was onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to set the country at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending between the Romans and *Ætoli*ans. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the kings minde before. Hauing made it, they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe : but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the riuier of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the *Ætoli*ans are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta : to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the suddens; entering, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie : who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had bene drinen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized vpon a Gate, whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans ; who more insolently dominated ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force.

force. For the Townes-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this businesse was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne, styling himselfe King : but, more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-necce lost all, by means of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately giuen him: since, he durst not stirre abroad ; and daily expected the mischiefe, that on all sides threatned him: Wherefore hee sent messengers, one after another, to the *Ætoli*ans ; requesting them, That as He had not bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward ; so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to neede it. It hath bene often said, That the rauenous *Ætoli*ans were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed : they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; & by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Democritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make warre with the Achaïans, or to doe ought elsse, save onely what Alexamenus should command them ; which were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming against all reason ; yet must they vnderstand, that vnlesse they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words : telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip : since the Elephants of this great king, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the *Ætoli*ans, He said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise : But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great king, which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart, bring forth his men, that had bin long pent vp in the Citie, and traine them without the wals : as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this : and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his *Ætoli*ans, and say somewhat as he thought fit : which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand : He then went aside to his thirty horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth ; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anone come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them : and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and strucke him downe. The thirtie *Ætoli*ans neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter : but all flew in ; and, before any succour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body : where in stead of seeking reuenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his *Ætoli*ans hastied into the Citie, and seized on the Palace : where he fell to ransacking the Treasure ; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like ; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the townes was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Capitaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children : whom they mounted vpon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the *Ætoli*ans that were idly stragling about ; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates, who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopamen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprize, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians, and the small, but effectuall, traualle of Philopemen, the Achæans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, wherof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

§. VII.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thous the Aetolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended, sundry passages betwene him, the Aetolians, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Aetolians, with the Ciuill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greekes to haue a sined peace, betwene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; where hee marieth a young wife, and reuels away the rest of winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Aetolians keeps the Streights of Thermopyle. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANTIOCHUS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behinde him; and to winnethem by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speede conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africke, there to molest the Romans, & so giue him the better leasure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thous the Aetolian came ouer to him, & bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Country-men had already taken Demetrias; a Towne of inaine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thous was bold to tell the king, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprize there could not be chosen a more vsuall man to be employed in the kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the king should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet, or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscaried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal prouidly, Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes nere vnto the kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; such of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkened vnto this admonition; being ielous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And therupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a tiuolous pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ilium; there to doe sacrifice to Minnus of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Megnetian, the same whom the Aetolians had lately waited on home; when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chiefe man & Ruler of this Nation. He therefore with his Countrey-men, in great frequentie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and took it as a signe of good lucke; to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magistrates found not the like cause of ioy: For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Arme somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were seruicable for the Warres; with an Armie of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse; and six Elephants. The Aetolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; & made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them; when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready; but hasted vnto their aide, euen whilest the season was vsuall for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, traualle, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had undertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrey free indecde, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not be any way burdened vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprovided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in neede. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betwene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus: That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thous, and some other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Councell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceived them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there beene; if this had so fallen out? He could haue beemoaned himselfe to Thous, and complained of the wrong; but he must haue bene contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thous would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture neede to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot; leaving the rest behinde him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsuall, they said, would neuer be obtained; vntill by remoouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery seuerall Estate had where to finde redresse of any preiudice. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them onely, so to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe in their power, to seeke redresse at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise asseme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute, was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since hee, and the Ætoli-ans, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætoli-ans, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the succours could arriue, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the rest of the Iland shortly yielded to Antiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little town of Boœtia, lying ouer against the Iland, where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priu-ledge of an inuolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilst others were buſied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke aduantage of their carelesse, and vſed them with all extremie of warre. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answers, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserved themselves vntill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He must hold them excused for not coming to stirre; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, ioynd with him in true meaning; save the Elcans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætoli-ans, and now feared the Achæans.
Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Achæans to his partie. Neuer-theless he assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopomeneus vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation & the Romans.
Wherefore both Hee and the Ætoli-ans sent Embassadors to the Councell at Ægium; that spared not braue words, if the Achæans would haue beene so taken. The Kings Em-bassador told of great Armies & Fleets that were comming; reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans & Caducians, names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphilians were; such indeede as could not be resisted.
Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the vtmost parts of the East, requested no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilst He tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætoli-ans Embassador, & further added, that in the battell at Cynosephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both He & his Armie had beene there destroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Ætoli-ans, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue beene desired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Em-bassador, nor the Ætoli-ans, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus linck-ed the King and the Ætoli-ans together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Achæans, who knew them to be lyars, had the Ætoli-ans also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feared by the King, with such tales as his Embassador told euen now, of Dahans, and Arians, & Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Veuſon, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vanter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him.

For all that varietie, wherewith he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than so many pieces of one tame swine, drest after severall fashions with varietie of saueses. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudge-ment of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was saine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Ætoli-ans; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætoli-ans had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men took heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much perswasion is needlesse. The Achæans did not loue so well the Ætoli-ans, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how hee sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Ætoli-ans.

How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appeares in the story foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though farre the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætoli-ans. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue beene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought, not how Smyrna and Lampſacus might recouer their liberty (which had neuer been held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countie, as two Seas by an Isthmus or neck of land, might bee kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiaticques, which originally were Greckish, than the general applause, wherewith all the nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Country, had bene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely & generously declared themselves altogether from the Romans, their friends & benefactors.
All the rest haue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Theſſalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Boœti-ans willingly received him, as soone as he entred vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had bin somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætoli-ans, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and wanted himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great, naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander; Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Antiochus: where having been foolishly knowne, by talking of his Pedegree; Hee was iudged by Antiochus and the Actolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him believe, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his father, it was their purpose to bestow the best for the conquest of Macedonia on his behoofe: since no man had thereto good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereto, it behooved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary king (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects, or whether from some vanity in king Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynopsephale, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but king Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein they should be pleased to vlt him.

The Actolians, Magnetians, Euboeans, Boeotians, & Athamanians, hauing now all ioynd with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or Whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessel of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. Hee freely told the king; That what he should now vnderstand, was then the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Boeotians, & other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates; that wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought most behoouefull, to win King Philip of Macedonia vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though inindeed what neede was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, *These Actolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then used to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insulence of the Romans: likening that king to some wilde beast, that was chained or locked up within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chains, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, upon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behooue vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage; let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedonia, and finde him workers to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein now you are embarked against the Romans; I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then giuen care, the Romans by this time should haue heard other news, than that Chalcis in Euboea was become ours: Italie and Gaulle should haue been on fire with war; and* little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italy. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouths.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other halfe, carrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of war, yet how to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile I neuer you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; save onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had wonne one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor, did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedonia professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the luccour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes affare off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; He brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a young Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, he shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise that when he took the field, he might evidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Aclius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shal meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loosenesse of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Aclius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwife Hee was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boijans; wherein hee purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Aclius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, & fifteen Elephants. Ptolemie King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with king Antiochus; and Philip king of Macedonia; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Aetolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young, and dwelt too farre off. So his money was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philip Embassadours answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Aclius the

Consul. Masinius likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine, which they would lend partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masinius farre out-went the poore city of Carthage; as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertooke to set out a Fleet at their own charges; and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-money, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne, it was accepted, with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, between the Roman and the Asiatick souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same maner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Babius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking stocke, & sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their cities, one after other, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne lives, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus, who having withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, Hee found all the promises of the Ætoliens meerely verball: and himselfe reduced into tearmes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-seene all this long before. Nevertheless He sent word to the Ætoliens, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no lesse than his. But the Ætoliens had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus, who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioined with him. Hereat the king was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thon and his fellows had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take Armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: Hee seized vpon the Streights of Thermopylae, as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath been spoken enough* before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came on wards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Iedge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece; vnlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a World of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himself vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilst he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætoliens, intreating them not to forsake him thus; but at leastwise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the the Streights, without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sicknesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them bene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to spy whether by any means they could get vp to the Ætoliens. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base conditioned enemies they had to dole about what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a foreiyn quey (for what happened vnto L. Valerius is vnertaine, save onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes: He commanded them to repose themselves: whilst Hee, being a very able man of body, tooke in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not hanted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae bin so often the Seat of War, as might cause any traualers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which he discovered both the Campe of the Greeks vnderneath him; and some of the Ætoliens very neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lustie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and wiled them by any means to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Ætoliens were no more than sixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee presently set vpon the Ætoliens, overthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying into their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified, and not onely defended by Antiochus in ten Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred down a shoure of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Ætoliens had bene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman Armes and ensignes were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and intreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætoliens onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis he met with King Philip, that hauing recovered health, came to ioyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victory was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia: at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who saue would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be: For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoyle of these townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antiochus, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Aetolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto king Antiochus presently after his flight, entreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece, or if any thing withheld him from comming in person, at leastwise to help them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider; that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Aetolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thersis, another of their Embassadors, Hec retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the king to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them, then did the Aetolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely he granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Palearius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto him selfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Where to Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Here vpon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith; signified, in their vse of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all once, as yeelding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was; and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said hee, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That ye deliuer vp vnto me Demetrius the Aetolian, Menestrius the Epitro, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greekes, who had yeelded themselves vnto his faith, not vnto slaverye. What? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Palearius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apoletii or ordinarie Council of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten dayes respit; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had beene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that king, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further neede of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Aetolians; taking for his reward, all that hee could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Perrhebia, Aferantia, & Dolopia. For the Aetolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre, yet they could not indure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea, & Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. He money Nicander conueighed into Lamia, by very vnusuall doctrine. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Aetolians, there to make report of his Embassyage; was very much perplexed: about this his journey, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the aduenturous keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or vnto still enough by Philip. But he seems that the king had not hitherto concotted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his seruants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he lost vnto glazing him to understand, That the Aetolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madness; forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented; but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans; & then with king Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship; whereof hitherto they had neuer made any myall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more appurable vnto each of them, than their small catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the king willed Nicander to signify vnto his Countreymen; and priuately to hold in minde the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; He lovingly dismissed him. For this beneuolence, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedonia: so as in the warre of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Aetolians refused to make their submission, he such wife as he required it: hee forthwith meane to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could do there. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it; for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Antius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue beene a loser, by standing from before it without Victory. So He said there welcome all the following time of his Consulship, whilest the Macedonian king and the Achaeans made farre better vse of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achaeans called to accompt the Eleians and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Aetolian side; and followed it in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleians got good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other helpe when the Achaean Prator wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they lent word, that at this Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Achaeans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achaean Prator, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Achaeans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Maiestie of a Roman Embassadour. Titus did fauour the Achaeans; yet could not like it wel, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus; which had once beene Philip's; and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander, who sent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this present warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Island to the Achaeans; whom he found ready Chaphon. Titus liked not of this; but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Casuers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their their Enemies; as a reward of the victory which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themselves vnto his discretion. So hee told them that their Common wealth was like a Tontoye; whereof Peloponnesus was the shell; and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes; which might greatly hurt them, hauing settled things thus in Peloponnesus. Hee went ouer to Naupactus; where Glabbrius the Consul had laid two moneths; that might haue bene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which hee had vpon the Etolians; or out of dislike of king Philip thirsting to satisfie the perswased the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, & so to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Etolians haue made such earnest suit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabbrius had bene sure to carry it in any short space: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it, since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole soure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came vnto Rome, no treaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much money: neither could they well hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderstood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilest the Etolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to set things in order among the troublesome Achæans. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedemonians home into their Countrey; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Achæans liked well enough; but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedemonians: intending to make it an Act of their own mere grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achæans: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Lilius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas Admirall to the king Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty saile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chafe. The kings Fleet was the better of saile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he tooke himselfe to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betwene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vaine hopes of the Etolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to congratulate this their Victorie: and in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his younger sonne, whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolomie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee desired the Senate not to forellow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vse it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolomie was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himselfe a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, & make him try the chance of a battell for his kingdome.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, hauing with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. Hee grants long Truce to the Etolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much trouble some businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An invasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamum, rayssed by an handfull of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desired peace, and is denied it. The battaile of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished; yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiaticque, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lilius. Lilius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would bee so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazzard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation; that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had bene victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation, where his wisdom was much approved, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a signe of the freedom that he vsed in his censures, euen whilest hee liued in such a Court. Antiochus murthered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him wish, that he had bene serued by such braue men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the king, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning, that all his Cost vpon the backs of cowardly Asiaticques, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to ghesse. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of his seruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.

The Scipios made all haste away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Aemilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabbrius besieging Amphyssa a City of the Etolians. The Etolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore so they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vnregarded the last yeere. Glabbrius knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foote, and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyssa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable, whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Etolians:

lians : entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words : and willed them to perfwade the Aetolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro : though Pablius continued to put them in good hope ; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had been chased from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre : whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate ; or any helpfull commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeeres truce : after which the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeeres leisure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio : who thought to all time lost, which with-held the Warre from passing ouer into Asia.

The businesse of Aetolia being thus laid aside : and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italy : the Scipio marched into Thessaly ; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon & Thrace vnto the Hellespont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyalty of King Philip : who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable aduantage : or at the least, would be vnfaithfull ; though he were not so courageous, yet might hee take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. Hee had promised them the utmost of his furtherance : wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall ; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as he should take them on the sudden. The King was merry at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came : whom he louingly bad welcome ; and shewed him the next day, not only what prouision of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in haste vnto the Scipio's : who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readinesse, that might helpe to aduance their iourney. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellespont : where they stayed a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere ; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian : true to the King ; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countrymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans & Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea ; thought to doe somewhat vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their followers should arrive to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke ; and sent word, as in great secretcie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleeued : and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting still when he should receiue a watch-word from Polyxenidas, that hee himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauens. The Kings Fleete set forth from Ephesus by night ; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in a harbour by the way, came the second night to Samos : where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Hauens. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauens ; so to guard the mouth of it : for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies, in another part of the Island : which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion : so as the enemies tooke him out of all order ; and sunke or boarded all his Nauie, save excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Beake-head : and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemy : who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies ; for feare lest they should burne together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleete.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest : whereof Polyxenidas could not take such aduantage as hee had hoped ; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, Hee was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they

they were not discouraged, for sooth to witte other Gallies : the Romans after washing Eumenes repaired their Fleet ; and all of them together, in great bodie, proceeded battail to Polixenidas before the Hauens of Ephesus : Whose hee durst not receiue : they went first place to place, attempting many things as by their strength enticed by the Rhodians, or perfwaded by some appearing hopes, of siding with the Romans : they little on nothing ; for those while they were hindered by Rhodians at Sea ; and while they by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet, was compelled to forsake them, and returne home to his defence of his owne Kingdoms. For Antiochus waited all the ground about Ikica & Perisgamus ; and leaving his sonne Selenus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamum, did with the rest of his Armie spoyle the whole Countrey thereabout. Antiochus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamum, having with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had no stand in feare, being too much inferior in numbers. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaeans : old souldiers all, and trayned by Diophanes, whose Schooller, in the Art of warre, Diophanes, their Commande was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamum, which was an high Towne, the demaund of the Enemy began to disdain that such men as they should hold their besieged. For Selenus his Arme which was encamped at the hill-top, seeing that none durst talke forth vpon them, grew so carelesse : as other wise, than by spoiling all he behidd their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrey. Diophanes therefore spake with Antiochus, and told them that hee would goe forth by encampment and stand from the Enemy off hand : Pergamum thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondered what his meaning was : but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a sort of his boldnesse ; and laughed to see with what an handful of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence, and idleness. Which Diophanes perceiving, he commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they well might ; and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, bade out all his soldiers vpon the Station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horses ready saddled, because few were gone, had the hearts to make resistance : so as hee did them all out of their Camp, and chased them as farre as he might safely be assured, without great slaughter of them ; and vnto losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamum, who had covered the walls of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle, were very ioyfull ; and highly magnified the vertue of these Achaeans. Yet would they not therefore loose touch of their gages, to helpe the Achaeans in doing what remained to be done. The newe daye broke, and hee escaped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before : and against him went forth Diophanes the second time ; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many houres, looking who should begin : Selenus in the end order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilest the Enemy was in fight : but as soone as the ground betweene them hindered the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soone overtaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere ; so as he brake them, and with all his force hurled them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Achaeans, and the boldnesse of his owne men, caused Selenus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiaticques, Philopomen had cause to tell the Romans, That hee could not be victorie. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his vncle Dijs betooke themselves to Ryot, as it had betne in a time of great security : a good man of warre might haue cut all their throates ; euen as they were tripling in their vncle's houses ; which Philopomen said that he would haue done, had he bene Generall of the Achaeans, and not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of businesse : and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trouble, brought almost nothing to passe. Hee had bene at Pergamum ; into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did push himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamum hee left his sonne as before hath bene shewed ; to wait to Elas : whether he heard that Antiochus the Roman Admirall was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Oratorie of peace : about which to conferre, Eumenes was sent for by Antiochus, and came from Pergamum. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul, this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Ouziridaw newly by Indication of a wicked cause, Antiochus to give over the siege of Pergamus: Afterwards, Antiochus five, Antiochus of sixe dayes worth of more were taken by the King: and the Syrian Rhodes being of Antiochus and Antiochus Sayle, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number: But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce, for that Antiochus the Cathaginians who together with Antiochus a Countie of Antiochus, was Antiochus the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Antiochus; and having the victory taken of his hand by Antiochus his fight, yet made such a feare, that the Rhodians durst not farre adventure vpon him: Now of these Antiochus which were by at Antiochus vnto the warre, the last and greatest was a victory of Antiochus by Sea, against Antiochus the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Antiochus a Promontorie in Asia: where Antiochus had with him fourescore excellent Gallies, and five of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the length which he could make by Sea, we may note the vanity of those brags, where Antiochus vaunted the last victory: That his Antiochus should cover all the shores of Antiochus. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twenty: the Rhodes being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light timbered and thin plancked, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither for they so beate themselves by the same device, with which, five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Antiochus. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy, who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being dermined. After a long fight, the Kings Naue hoysted saile: and having a faire vantage, bore away toward Antiochus as fast as they could. Yet some of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirtene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Rhodes and their followes lost only two or three shippes: but got hereby the absolute Mastrise of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seeme to have taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remaining, to defend those places that he held in hope, he prefently withdrew his Garrisons from Lyfymachia, which might easily have beene kept, until the end of Winter following, and have reduced the besiegers (which he had beene continuing) vnto termes of great extremity. Hee also gave out the siege of Antiochus, and flying as if all thought sawe onely of de-10 Antiochus to gether all his Armie, and fled for helpe to his father-in-law, King Antiochus Cappadocian.

The Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellepont, but had preceeded vnto him all places there belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was there also in readinesse, to transport him over into Asia: where Antiochus had taken such care before, that hee landed quietly at his owne good ease, even as if the Countrie had beene his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassador that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the Romans which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, should now persuade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampacus, and Lyfymachia, had bene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lyfymachia; and was further put upon, not to strive with the Romans about Lampacus and Smyrna, what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it were his desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also left at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia, so as she bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare half the charges, whereas they had bene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves content with these good offers, and not to be so impatient vpon confidence of their fortune, hee expected their answer. These offers which the Embassador seemed to great, were iudged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since he began through his owne fault, and that he should not onely depart out of these few Townes, which he held in Asia and Lyfymachia, but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadors therefore saw, that where better bargaing could be made, he dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him hee promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne, who (it is vncertaine by what assistance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King: Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making such a mends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publike businesse: hee onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lyfymachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome, there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition, where-10 by he may haue peace.

The king was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had bene already subdued, a little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it hee must giue away. Hee had with him threescore and tenn thousand foot, and twelue thousand Horse, besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neere him, apace as one hastning to fight. But how soeuer he was affected, he made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sicke at Antiochus, he sent thither vnto him his sonne without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sicknesse, and with-10 out desirous to retaine the young Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtiesie before the battell, as would afterwards haue bene little worth; than to stay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue bene much anieable vnto his health. In recompence of the kings humanitie, hee said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other aduice, than by aduising him not to fight vntill 30 hee shall heare that I am in the Campe.

That he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus refused to follow his counsaile, and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygia or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, hee fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul, and sat downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some, and were anon, with some losse, driuen backe over the River. Two daies were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance, nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and a halfe 40 of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom their ordinary Corps du gard repelled. Foure daies together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul tooke aduice what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoeuer disadvantage, or else resolute to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vntlesse they would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more conuenient 50 place; and so defer the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie; That this great Armie should be assayed, even in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being very loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy, resolute to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the field againe, and ordered their Battells:

Hee also did the like, and aduanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Arme consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points, the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at such distance as was vusual, and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achazans, and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnmost of all (saue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troupes of horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to bee beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beastes: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The kings Arme being compounded of many Nations, diuersly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kinds, in such wise as each might be of most vlc. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the middle, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirty in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beastes, and such as being adorned with Fignals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fiftene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choyce of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, diuided in their severall kinds, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin stretched out in Front. Adioyning vnto these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the kings owne Regiment; called the Argaspiders, or Siluerbields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtzans, and Elymazans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cytzians, Elymazans, and many others, hauing also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Selenus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded ouer the Phalangiers.

The first on-set was giuen by the Dromidaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with shoutings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such varieties of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the king, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. but M. Emilio, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellows: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouraged the approach; Hee not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine about three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night, hearing that Selenus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townes-men and Souldiers were so disinayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded vp themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilist they were on the way. Neither were many daies spent, ere Antiochus his Embassador was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the king his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answer, because that it should bee gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that warre, they required fiftene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing, by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thes the Atolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this war, delivered into their hands. But any wife man might so easily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The kings Embassadors had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and Cn. Manlius Valso. The Atolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre vpon the Atolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this, came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea, by king Eumenes in person, whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his own deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masaniissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniissa was onely such in title; and since both hee and his Father had alwayes beene their friends, euen in the very worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At the length hee craued they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the king in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alledged against him as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point wherupon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against king Antiochus was so great; as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euery one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against king Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victory had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged among other obediencies with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies, the Bookes of Hermetes, and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The Ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and fallion among the Roman Nobilitie.

MARCUS Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided betwene them, 30 which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparant, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Alliance, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowly termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadors were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie, which was, to entreate the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neyther were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well de- 40 uise, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied aduantage.

Poorer king Aminander liued in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that many of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing bene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuerued with them after an homely manner, could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, vsed by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertook the worke. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with an thousand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Townes in the Countrey, to his vse. The same of this good successe at first; with diuers letters rapping from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Thacium a few dayes; giuing thereby some leisure vnto his King to pro-

provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home sixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, hee left all saue two thousand behinde him, and so came to Atheneum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Thebes awhile, to take a place lying ouer Argitheia, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither hee, nor the king had the boldness to descend vpon Argitheia; for that they might perceiue the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them; when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially 10 when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argitheia, & presently withdrawn by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes, few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians hauing found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, & were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently reuolted and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had bene euer belonging to the 20 Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away, seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne king so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse, for that neeces came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his hasting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that hee had recouered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemed it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were that pe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fulvius went in hand with the businesse; about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chiefe seate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquests by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who inuaded the Counties of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to 30 deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driuen to leaue vnto his successeur the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it 40 deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. Hee also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediatur, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was gricuous to the weaker, but not vnjustifiable. The same 50 Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession; for that Philip had made a very gricuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him: Heereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace; which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the Maiestie of the people of Rome; and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they hauing bene the first that called these their Masters into the Countre. The ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacinthus from the Achæans: by stifly pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilste they seemed to forebare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of their controuersies, when they should arise. And hereof good vse will bee shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victories, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. Hee was euen laden with booty, when, hauing fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered ouer the Countre: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they did serue vnder king Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an In-land Countre, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had bene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or drue, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forebare the attempt of forcing them, or easily bee repelled; and that finally, when hee had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had bene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would haue serued well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, who neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defenseiue Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of their men did escape aliu: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backs.

These warres being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul, his Prouince for another yeere. Fulvius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom he had vanquished, as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and receined the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, hauing set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellespont, laden with spoyle, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many yeers extorted, from the wealthy Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull vse, which the Roman souldier had bene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and flaures of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the feedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrey of Thrace lay between Hellespont & the kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and siffic ships of warre, to take part with him and the Etolians, promising moreover to restore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to giue away not only the halfe of Asia, but Chersonnecus & Lyfianachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipios, which he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into neer acquaintance with Fulvius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipios had not a disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these vsptair kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had ioyned with Antiochus and the Etolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrey. They knew all aduantages; and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behind: though both the getting and the fauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew to night: & then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax, as an vnworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that hee made good answer, and was approved by the chiefe of the Senate. One claufe is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindred the peace with Antiochus;

they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Armie over Taurus, and aduerturing vpon the calamitie threatned by Sibyls verses, vnto those that should passe the fatal bowle. What calamitie or ouerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophetic threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a fort, the Countreies on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophetic, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolomie king of Egypt, that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, swelled at random in the large field of Time, there to take roote, and get credit by cunct; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolomie to his kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should haue any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophetic. Of the Sibylline præditiõs, I haue sometimes thought reuerently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the books of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Cusanus vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparant; That not onely those prophesies of Sibyl, wherein Christ fo plainly was shewd; but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained; (whosoener desired them) by the vnderferet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forrein proofs. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can bee more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue beene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosphers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherfore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of Simoni Sango: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebelle, had many ages before beene consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sango, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sango, therupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their falsheit is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot bee safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him; euen so long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the the heat of an Inquisition, than raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipios were called one after other into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they beganne, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered him selfe to speake. Having audience, he told the people, That vpon the same day, of abo 10 yeere hee had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, & finished the Punicke warre by a signal victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to bragge at that a way, but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there giue thanks to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods; by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well & happily discharged this most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto hee invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the founteinne yeere of his life, with like honour, grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preiudiced the satisfaction of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the gratefull of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the court, followed Scipio, leauing the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their own slaues & a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, Munke for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnto request, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let falter their law; but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, & his vnthankfull Romans; that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Litternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends; and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntary banishment, is vn certaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopemeus, as also of his priuate behaviour at Litternum, render it probable, that he out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers, who 30 meant to haue drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Collegues (as one of them, had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was: the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Asiaticus. They propounded a Decree vnto the people, touching mony receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should giue charge, vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Orator was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugall also, both of the publike and of his owne; so as in this kinde hee was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifull and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice, which being possed with enuie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilst he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own ranke, men raised by desert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periuirg. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold & silver, gotten in the 40 Campaigne of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios, grew partly, besides his generall spight at the Nobilitie from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls, had husbandry (iudging Maximus), licence to be no better in some preceptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, that hee had no need of such double diligence in his Treasury. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of iudgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was in him, Cato filled Rome with vttruse reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerer inquiry and iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was seene condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should haue been laid vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing bene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had bene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not bene, or not bene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Security of danger from abroad; and some want of sufficient employment, were especial helpees to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes & murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sons, whilst they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatous began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marinus, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therein, means to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cesar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailling against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subiects vnto the arbitrary gouernment of one: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleueed of her selfe as if shee had, whilst a king sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consumption of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discouer.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They dealt insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonians, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius, of whom thenceforth hee becomes zealous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had bene, before the arriual of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, and to reforme (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appelles, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appelle, or last resort, as euery petty iniurie offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and inforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vterly dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especial regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skillfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformance vnto them in matter of warre & peace, together with the diuersion of his thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they, very louing vnto Masinissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion sited in Affricke: as likewise afterwards to the kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the Ministry of kings; especially of such Kings, as were vifull and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; & shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise continued by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their estate, & a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his country, prepared the wayes for them; and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, licence, euen from the Romans themselves.

These townes of Ænus and Maronea had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transyluania: in which Prouince it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title, for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe: fell to Selenus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptoleme Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Selenus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those hyapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gauls being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had bene oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, king Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behooued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Heereunto hee made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his kingdome. But this Plea had not auailed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: & in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey therabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia & Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges between him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuerthelesse, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes, wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoeuer hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at least wile to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians claims by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done; but so it taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maestie, to an accompt. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who so ruined, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more seuer, and more thoroughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should bear their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Maronea, nor nere to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because hee should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him poysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machiavel taught vnto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing bene apt schoolers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witnesse; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, & were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliuer his owne grievances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had bene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing bene well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome; and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilst this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had bene Iudges between him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betwene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Achæans. It was objected vnto the Achæans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walls of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycorgus. Hereto Lycorgus, then Prætor of the Achæans, made answer, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they so laid the blame vpon others: the Achæans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walls of Lacedæmon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycorgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walls and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achæans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly tolde App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countreymen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and giue account of their actions, as vassals and slaues to the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achæans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatness; and intimate, as they began, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achæans haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, & which without periuice could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him; he pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, That if the Achæans would not be ruled by faire means, and earne thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Achæans, which 10 groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet feare preuailed above Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hercupou the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Romane Senate, very soone after, did make void all iudgements of death or banishment, that had bene laid by the Achæans vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had bene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by 30 contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achæa, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achæians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, & all kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile & perswasion of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their private passions, & neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of self-ruine, brought 49 them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as shortly hee was like to doe. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indigntie soone following. Hee had bene 50 long vsed at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, vnskillful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer, he was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as he had recieued from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any good will in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intercession of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans, did increase in Philip his his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a ialousie of his too forward sonne. To let him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome, some bringing one commandement, some another, and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had bene imposed vpon him by their fore-goes. Neither were there wanting that obserued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than hee needed must. With these Embassadours young Demetrius was conuersant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the 10 rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the king, should not succeed vnto his father, but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by more fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this ialousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§ II.

19 The death of Philopomen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most unhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late bene so peremptorie with the Achæans; that they seemed not vnlike to take part against them, in any controuersie that should bee moued. Hercupou the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achæan Commonwealth, hauing long bene of a contrary Faction thereto, grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, 30 freed from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerful in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the business; were careful to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might bee entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie, whereby it was probable that blood should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would bee left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopomen, then Prator of the Achæans, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achæans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readines 40 to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horfemen, he had some Auxiliaries out of Thracie and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilst his horfemen were too earnest in following the chase, there arrived, by chance, a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that were fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopomen his Horfemen to turne backe. Philopomen himselfe had long bene sicke of an Ague, and was then very 50 weak: yet the greatness of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduantaged themselves vnder his conduct. Hee tooke vpon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his Horfemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrise from approaching ouer-nere to him: But it fell out vnappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his Horfe, and being withall in very weak plight of body, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleueed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were iu witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleueed, that he was hardly thought to bee in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne forth to meet him, him, and beheld the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, where they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man intractable; and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or inuery done to him, vntreuered. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopamen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, hee said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakened with long sicknesse, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaens, when they missed him in their sight, were maruellously offended with themselves, for that they had beene more mindefull to preserve their owne lues, than to looke vnto the service of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were doubting what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched vnto Melene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serue. Lycortas was chiofen General of the Armee against Melene: who coming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in shortspace to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had bene partakers in this murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the allies of Alabon: which were carried home in solemn pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them (that were his friends) as sacrificed to his Ghost whom they had offended. Proculus, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. Hee would haue entemedled in this businesse of Melene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintus Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spightful enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livy thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliuie to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret sallies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any reasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to saue himselfe from their torments and mercilesse hands; who, as hee well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, heeooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwaies preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduersitie fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he vttered these words: I will now (think he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres possesed them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, which I am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer be numbered among the rest of his heroicall decdes: No; it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how saue the ancient Roman vertues degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their Defenders; as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italie, and was ready to giue them battell at their owne doores, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poy- son; where as these of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith giuen, and contrary to the Lawes of Hospitalitie, to slaughter or deliuer vp his owne Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vnderooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolve it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Country and Common-weale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ialousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Protection more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ialousie of men, the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are solatietull to God, as with so good reason did Marius the Marshall of France confesse, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues, haue raised them above the leuell of their inferiours, and haue surmounted their enuie: yet haue they bene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof: as Coriolanus, M. Lucius, L. Antimius, and this our Scipio, whom wee haue lately buried. Among the Greekes we read of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that David bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ishb. With this rare Alexander feasted Permenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Attius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armes, that euer was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, beside runne-awayes, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Attius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian (sue Attius) murdered the Emperour; which hee neuer durst attempt, Attius liuing. And; besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Attius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolved than obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and hee died a blinde beggar. Narses also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That rule of Care against Scipio, hath been well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Musapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Fiefers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalues, who draue the French out of Naples; and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Barles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations haue bene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may be said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet quait it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have beene giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traitorously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the aduantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vndereternally were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnes of their warlike vertues, is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the 10 Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniuently gotten, and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iustine, hauing recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the 20 Emperour and his sonne. Anastatius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastatius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriuing, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand 30 haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulness in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and hee deliuered the Citie by his wisdom: but none remembered this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them think to saue of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes couened and abused, which proues that weaknesse to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are 40 not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most iniquiously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being so lately recited.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to undertake, her Maiesty had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord 50 Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiesty had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her dayes neuer received dishonour, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.

For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randel, Drenwrie, Reade, Wissford, Lytton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunnittable, Bonchier, Barkelley, Bingham, and others: 60 for those of a later and more dangerous employment, whereof Norris and Vere were the most famous, & who haue done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Colonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauels and wounds) no little nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Maiesty in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleue other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue beene subiect, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weaknesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Adors are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are neereest the person of Princes (which Martial men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession farre more noble than their owne, seeing therein they should onely inuide their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deserving, and of farre greater vlt than themselves.

30 But his Maiesty hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yeere 1588. as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Sea; hauing first commanded as a Capitaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiesty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Kussell, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§ III.

Philip making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subjects. His negotiation with the Barmes. His crueltie. Hee suspecteth his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue beene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

40 Quintus Martius the Roman Embassador, who trauelled vp and downe, seeking what worke might bee found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vie the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discouered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enjoyed him, yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was doubting. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obsequiousnesse to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) 50 by what means soeuer. Hee was in an ill case: as hauing beene already vanquished by them, hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto yrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could deuise, against the necessitie which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, hee compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured against against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuised vpon alluring the Bastarnæ, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the riuer of Danubius, to abandon their fear, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardaniens, and take possession of their Country. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could bee hoped by their arriual, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardaniens; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarnæ, by hope of spoyle, and other inticements, vnto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarnæ from their owne habitations, into the land of the Dardaniens, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious iourney vnto them, that carried with them their wiues and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them, since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarnæ came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time hee neglected not the training of his men to Warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their ancient dwellings, & betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meetest for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also hee did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparant. This cuill therefore would soone haue beene determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from iust sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly did seeke reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deferuently. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall, when the King in a most barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom hee had inured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill hee should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnnimally pleasure, some accidents, more tragical than perhaps hee could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the kings younger sonne. It may well bee (though it may be also suspected, that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and rowndinesse of Demetrius, like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreame ieaousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the vnlightely continuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were rested at in ordinary discourse and table-talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, euen in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conuersation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus, who fearing (so much lest his brother should step betwene him and the succession), converted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeeres old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought olde and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practises, than his free speeches discovered. This diabolous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne; a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was vnto to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the contrail, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the kings of Macedon; from the very first Antigonal, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the king betwene his two kinsmen: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard, whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into three parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vntill they were weary, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-carnostly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater battail. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorry for this, as it had becomen bad presage; but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vlt. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiving which way the kings fauour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to obserue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indiscreetly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brother's man: yet hee would leaue notice of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, fearing to bee ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to preuent all danger: Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his doores, as if hee stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himselfe excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him bee gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the king. The elder brother accused the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged; and in effect the same hath beene here recited, saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had vnderaken this murder, & would perhaps also dare to vndertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom hee knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by that. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof hee shewed a letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the king himselfe: wherein the contents were, That hee had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence bee enforced, That this counsell was giuen by Them, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should should have avowed his brother to Rome, and makethem, forgetting their duties to their old King, become enemies to this young Traytor. Demetrius. Here to Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that conspired matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did beare him, He said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wise from their opinion of the cause: so as by an impious practice, Hee were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Judges. The king pronounced like a father, though zealous father, that he would conclude nothing upon the excessse or error, whatsoever it were, of one day, and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their times, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed: And herein he may seeme to have dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gaue himself over wholly to Perseus: vnto so little conference with his younger sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to haue him present, nor neere vnto him. About all he had especial care, to learne out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philus and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interested in the quarrells betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents whereof were: A deprecation for the young Prince, with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vnusurpable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuce. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the king, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pitied the estate of the vnhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discouered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome, where he might hope not onely to live in safety, from his father & brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuerfion vnto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, & in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a prooffe sufficient, at least, of the kings despit against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings vnadvised sentence, first gaue payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Heereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedies who villanously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the face of Antigonus there had not beene found a king, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander felt either with themselves, or euen vpon their heeles; by intestine discord and jealousies, so grounded on desire of foueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnnatural hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Seleucus and Seleneus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that a parricidal family of the kings of Pergamns had raised it selfe to marvellous greatness, in a very short space, from the condition of meere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples, but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainly hee had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith king Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himselfe of an vnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmet to be a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subiects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded him with a draught of his owne Payson. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bene objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole proceffe. His onely remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remouee of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romanes were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making prouision against them. Hee was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betweene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner 10 desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the king a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imaginations, the like whereof hee had neuer bene flow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatfull to Perseus: and thus becoming subiect vnto the same jealous impression which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsaillour, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the king, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philus 30 and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flamininus, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xyebus a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vied by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying, That this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to vtter what he knew. Xyebus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that he had bene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme; when he vnderstood that by the vnnatural practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischief. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, 40 Philus was taken: and either foras much as he could not denie it when Xyebus confronted him, yeilded himselfe guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrie: yet not so stout as to adventure himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thrace, whilst his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive grieft of minde; so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere he could bring his purpose to 50 effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of being forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thanke his owne peruerse condition: since his Vncle, king Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it ease for him, to accomplish any moderate desires; if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was iustly punished by feeling the difference betweene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which hee affected, and the

the life of a king, where of he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilest yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified vnto Perseus, by Callicrates the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse improuidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Basterna fell vpon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romanes: and how they suffered Massinissa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romanes discover their intent of warring vpon him.

IMMediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Basterna into Thrace: where order had beene taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Country. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as no other was known than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should bee done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dash and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Basterna would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Basterna had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assailing a place of strength; or whether because of extreame bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the carelesse vsing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Country.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a war so dangerous, as that with the Romanes was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the settling of his Estate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To win loue of his people, he fate personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein he was so ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained): as also hee gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, he had care to auoid all necessity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league, which he obtained, & was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, & other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the maistring passion, which ouer-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooofe of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romanes continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heavy hand: & suffered Massinissa to take from them what he listed.

listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romanes. Massinissa therefore had great aduantage ouer them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romanes not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Countie of Emporia: and so did he vse them againe and againe, with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Massinissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the neighbours, for loue of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Massinissa take from them by force: and by the Romanes (to whose iudgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this iniury, when Massinissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them about fiftientie Townes and Castles; without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romanes. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withst and the violence of Massinissa, invading their Country, howsoeuer he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romanes, they durst not presume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to bee eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romanes indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice, or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hands; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, that the Romanes yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Massinissa should be allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If one of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romanes would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended: since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves shoud not should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and hence otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Harghian. And here withall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines, of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased, slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaves in the Streets of Carthage, & in all cities of Africk & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so exactly desired. Onely they want peace with Massinissa, once their mercenarie, & now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruel hands they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they; & adore the Romanes, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue bene their owne. Battle the Romanes had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battel at Cannæ, than Hannibal that won it was vsed by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed euery man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought a much, though being in extreame want, to set out an Armie so into Spaine, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were the Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought against their betters, most patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pitifull behaviour breed peraduenture some commiseration: yet their teares may seeme to haue beene misused, as proceeding not from any compunctiō vnto the Romanes, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They had, as themselves able to fight with Massinissa; which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome: wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought.

of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leaue obtained they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming, and had related vnto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuers nights, in the Temple of Esculapius: whereupon he himselfe was to be dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to inuoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for feare of vrging them vnreasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vltage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behaviour. They hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) hee perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, so sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to any, they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Enphroner, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Enphroner had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vntill either they had bene extremely prouoked, or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them: Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angrily this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had innaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians, whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had bene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league between them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greeks, & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinary fauour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Scemably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheless vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in vsurping the practice of Armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Achæans, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested; and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, receiued this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argiues, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians, would ruolt from the Achæans; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopemen: at what time it was beleueed, that the Common-wealth of Achæa was like to fall into much distresse; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prator of the Achæans had vterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no towne rebelled from the Achæans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue suted their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to let on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Romane Arts howsoever many (for gainefull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble vntill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preserve their libertie and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to bee deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to haue affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him in his affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopemen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, wherinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Romane patronage. Indeed they not onely perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves themselves grieved with the present subiection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone be at an end, when honestie and loue of the Common-weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful prouision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly aduertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors, of whom euery citie in Greece had too many: as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly, or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callierates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man, one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callierates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alleaging what was meetest in iustification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Achæans and all the rest of Greece, with a faire more heauy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the feeling of their authority, among his froward Countrymen; if they meanc not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee regarded; any iunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not bee so, if hee, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wills: who ceased not to asseme, That no Columnes or Monument erected, nor no solemn oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to bee of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue care vnto such persuasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vndertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they became the preualent faction. It was therefore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amptitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious & rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these & the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsaile, in every point; yea to depreesse all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all citie of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callierates; they aduised all men, to be such and so affected, as hee was, in their seuerall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callierates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countrey into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless he forbore to vaunt himselfe; of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely hee so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his ready obsequiousnesse vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes won many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his enemies had. Thus were all the citie of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting onely the good of the Estates, wherein they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a king, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them iust occasion to make warre vpon him. Perseus hauing finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a iourney to Apollis his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Armie along with him; yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoeuer, done by his father, might bee buried with his father; since his owne meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue beene pleased better, if hee had behaued himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a iourney, without their licence, this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Achæans: which his father had so lost, that by a soleme decree, they forbade any Macedonians to enter their territories. It was ieaalousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of two Arats, giuen them cause to abhorre him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, hee had, for the more part, bene to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of inuasion was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the kingdome of Macedonia: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their matters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaves very profitable vse. But Perseus tooke hold vpon this occasion: as silyly seruing to pacifie those, whose enmity faime he would haue changed into loue. He therefore apprehended all those fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achæans, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Prætor, before the Councel. But Callierates took the matter very angrily; and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romanes. Heerewithall hee tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achæans before-hand acquainted with the Warre, that was coming vpon Perseus from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly hee rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarnæ, vpon the Dardanians; the kings iourney against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; & finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the event of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Heereto good answer was made by the Prætors brother: That Callierates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had louingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so: why might not the Achæans, as well as the Atolians, Theſſalians, Epirots, & all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuerthelesse Callierates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-liffely gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilst, That since the king had onely sent a letter without an Embadour; they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needes vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faime, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was prooue sufficient to one that could vnderstand of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callierates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embadour: whereby it became apparant, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

Now Eumenes King of Pergamus was buffed with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vniuersall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly loue betwene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to possess some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

Polyb. Legat. 50. & 59.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had beenetroubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this, being at good leisure, he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore he was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe euery where stale: whilst Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans. had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignitie, He stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirect courtes of reuenge. The Lycians could not be saued by his patronage, from seuer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achæans, as too vniuersally, misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to haue regarded, had hee not beene too vainely ambitious) befall him, especially for his being ouer-feruiceable to the Romans; and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it in vaine to strue any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore he resolved euery to ouerturn the foundations of this popularitie, by inducing the Romans vterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian kingdome, which all too vainely worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wilnes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in businesse of neighbours; his riches, and his great prouisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and sixethousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to liue vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subjects. He grew withall hee prayed them to consider, that king Seleucus the sonne and successeur of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not-wooping, but Seleucus offering the match; That king Prusias of Bythynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassadors from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loath to vtter it plainly) That euery the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as, that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, & that he had expelled Abryopolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them, since it would be to himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the staff of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to belecue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intention. Now though it were so that hee told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostilitie against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto; their more than vniuersall curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne, helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speake, and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemed to have disclosed all: when the wariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearfull apprehension; against which, it behoued their wisdom to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore carelesse audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embassadors, who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer bene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laudice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifullly required, so the Romans despihtfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were setting themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, that it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere vassals, but as dependants and associates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the tenne Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against king Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masaniissa, The Aetolians, and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to finde themselves agrieved if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily be made their followes, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was onely to plague the Rhodians, for their good wil to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors, which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the king so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all cares had bene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That king Perseus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might saue of hostility; but that, if his traualle in this kinde proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrarie to expectation. These bigge words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction giuen by the king, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouering his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanuerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was hold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subiect (in appearance) to fortune, which might haue bene his, had he knowne how to vse it.

Now that this brauery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture soone after, on a practice that more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in turning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolu'd to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themselves, behinde a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruiled with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because hee should not discouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Ile of Agina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as King, & either tooke or would haue taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue; That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, receiued none other checke, than that hee should forbear to marrie with the Queen, untill hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the preiudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in speciall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdom from his brother to him. By such concord of brethern was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue been, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saued all from discouerie. But as he was deceiued in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For hee had writtento one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this businesse: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium: who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret, had presently fought out the Embassador, and therof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needes doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the king should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. Hee durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at liberty; he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the king had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the kings denall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a king, to proue the rightfulness of making warre vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in iudgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might haue bene easie) than any that wee finde by them produced: yet the base & cowardly temper of Perseus was very suteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they iudging him to haue offended in the nature of a king. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if hee might not send men, to waste the kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the king? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it it by poyfon? Wherefore they prefently decreed warre againſt him; and ſent Embaſſadours to denounce it vnto him, unleſſe hee would yeeld to make ſuch amends as they ſhould require. He ſeemed at this time to haue bene ſo confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he deſired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at leaſt he thought by ſhew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. He cauſed the Embaſſadours to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearſall of all matters, which they had long bene collecting againſt him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that hee had entertained long and ſecret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embaſſadours ſent to him out of Aſia, about ſome ill purpoſe. In regard of all which they peremptorily required ſatisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue ſtood vpon the euidence, brought againſt him by Rimnius and Praxo. For if thoſe accuſations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwiſe they were deſtitute; it being no fault in a King, to be ſtrong, wel-belo- ued, and well friended. Perſeus answered, for the preſent, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embaſſadours, that were no better than meere ſpies. Finally, he promiſed to giue them in writing their full an- ſwer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer ſtand to the league, made be- tweene them and his father, and renewed by himſelfe indeed onely for feare: but wi- led them to defend to more equall conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduiſe, as they might alſo doe for theirs.

Polyb. Legat. 9.

Liv. lib. 33.

In the forme of the league betwene Philip and the Romans, as it is ſet downe by Poly- bius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting thoſe which he immediately performed. But Livie inſerts a claule, whereby he was expreſly forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is moſt likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entering ſhortly into league with Rome, did ſo binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene reſtrained by plaine covenant. And thus might that ſeeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by conſequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and ſay, that the Macedonian might not beare deſenſive armies, without their permiſſion: then had Perſeus very iuſt reaſon to finde himſelfe grieued. For ſince they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whileſt they themſelues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elſewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why ſhould they now interpret the bargain after another faſhion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chaſtiſe his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By ſuch allegations hee maintained the right of his cauſe, in very milde ſort; when it was too late. At the preſent, by diſclai- ming the league as vniuſt; he miniſtered occaſion vnto the Embaſſadours, to giue him de- fiance. Hauing heard the worſt of their meſſage; he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdom in three dayes. But either he ſhould haue bene leſſe vehement, or more conſtant in his reſolution. For if his heart could ſerue him to vndertake the warre; hee ſhould courageouſly haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whileſt the Enemy was vnprepared; not haue loſt opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worſe peace than the former.

§. VI.

§. VI.

The Romans ſolicit the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the warre againſt Perſeus. How the Greekes ſtood affected in that warre. The Timarauiſſe of Perſeus. Martius a Roman Embaſſador deludes him with hope of Peace. His forces. He takes the field, and winnes part of Theſſaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Conſul: and what aſſiſtants the Romans had in this warre. Of Tempe in Theſſaly, and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had; but loſt by his feare. Perſeus braves the Romans; fights with them; knowes not how to uſe his victorie; ſues for Peace, and is denied it by the vnapprehended. Perſeus hauing the worſe in a ſkirmiſh, forſakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebell againſt the Romans, and are rigorouſly puniſhed. The Roman Com- manders unfortunate in the warre againſt Perſeus. They vex the Greekes their friends; for whoſe cauſe the Senate makes prouiſion, hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans bene ſeeking occaſion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well might they haue bene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouiſions. But it was on a ſudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together ſeemed more than ſufficient. This opportunitie of making their cauſe honeſt in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwiſe they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reaſon to beleue, that their owne ſtrength was ſuch as would preuaile in the end; they haſtily embraced the faire occaſion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Nei- ther was this their vnreadineſſe a ſmall helpe, towards examining the diſpoſition of the Greekes, and others; who muſt afterwards clearely pay for any backwardneſſe found in their good will. There was not indeed any cauſe to feare, that all of the Greekes or o- ther Eaſterne people ſhould conſpire together, and take part with the Macedonian: ſuch was the diſſention betwene their ſeueral Eſtates; how focuer the generalitie of them were enclined the ſame way. Neuertheleſſe Embaſſadours were ſent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe againſt Perſeus, or rather to demand it, in no leſſe ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it againſt Philip and Antiochus, in warres pre- tending the liberty of Greece. The Embaſſadours yled as gentle words for faſhions ſake, as if they had ſtood in doubt, that their requeſt might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with ſuch Roman courteſie: and vnderſtood that not only ſuch as made reſuſall, but euen they who might ſeeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were liſt to heare other manner of words, when once this buſineſſe was ended. Wherefore none of them were ſcrupulous in promiſing the beſt of their helpe to the Romans: the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their beſt, left it ſhould be ill taken, as if they had halted in ſome part of their dutie. It is ſtrange, that men could be ſo earneſt to ſet vp the ſide, whereof they gladly would haue ſeene the mine. The vulgar ſort was euery where addicted to Perſeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if ſome were vehemently Roman, they wanted not oppoſers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wiſeſt and moſt honeſt, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wiſhed better to Perſeus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Hiſtorians was one: who though hee * iudged the victory of Perſeus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wiſhed hee the Romans ill to thine, that ſo the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his en- deuours in which courſe, he was at length tyrannically handled, as ſhall be ſhewed here- after. This conſidered, it appeares, that an extraordinarie feare, and not onely reu- rence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans and other Eſtates of Greece, thus confor- mable to the Romans. The occaſion of this their feare, may be iuſtly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perſeus himſelfe. He had vndertaken a warre, whereof the be- nefit ſhould redound, not onely to his owne kingdom, but vnto all that were oppreſſed by the Romans. Yet no ſooner were ſome few companies brought ouer-ſea, to make a countenance of meaning ſomewhat againſt him, than he began to ſpeak the enemy faire, and ſue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery ſmall thing would ſerue to terrifie him; & conſequently, that it ſhould at all times be in the Romans power, by

by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and solliciting all to ioyne with him: But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, hee sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Quintus Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenesse in conning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the king intreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius Very gently rebuke the king, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned: Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conueniently bee done, a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the king lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue bene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, hee no way increased his forces, hee suffred a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betweene to him and the Romans, wherby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his lye standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnesse might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly 30 of his owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a timely beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Boeotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonians, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a short time, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their severall Townes to make themselves apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebel) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Boeotians from Thebes their head, was more than Alexander could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedaemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad; was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with king Perseus, against a number nor so great as followed the Lacedaemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the king sat still, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was contemned, and (though some reprooued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; and since was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly set how their Master was deluded: but rather excuse, not intreatie, would iure their time; the Senate being refused before-hand what to doe, it was enough that they were admitted into the Citie; & had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came hither on the same errand, did their message without the walls, in the Temple of Belona, the vsuall place of giuing audience to open open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie; and had onely the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue onely to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest; but it was a likely meane, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Romane Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their king at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue roused Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his kingdome, that so hee might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard: But finally, the stoutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proved, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. Hee now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Cidium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, hee did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Cidium. His armie 10 he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers of sundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their feuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks; but answered, That his owne provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them onely to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Country, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wonne by force. Of these last was Mylae, a Towne thought impregnable, & therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fallie; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Velatiae and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of 40 Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the king marched onwards to Sycorium, a town seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the feuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masaniassa sent thither his sonne Misaganes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Artabates the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Protonice (though Protonice was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonians, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucetius, the Roman Admirals brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the haven of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucetius tooke away, after a very kind sort, making shew to beleue, that for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But what fouer Gentius thought in the beginning, he foolishly lost both his kingdom and himselfe, in the end of this warre, by offering, rather than giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought over the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painefull journey, through the mountainous Countrey of A-¹⁰ thamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. Hee refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where hee then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing bene freed by them from a more heauy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a be-²⁰ nefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountains Ossa & Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurres or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed, it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnlesse they would make an hungry journey, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being ma-³⁰ ster of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aons, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behind the mountains of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of Seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses⁴⁰ they once desired; notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps bee said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too far from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Aetolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into supposition with the Romans (as were shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, (how positively fouer Martinus had wrought with them, aduantaged themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodi-⁵⁰ ans, Ilyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, than they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his well-willers, yea & bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginaty. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue bin expected expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that warre, wherof he should haue fought the honour, he left his friends that would haue stood by him, & gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safety: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, hee chose rather to set his backe to the mountains of Tempe, & defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inescapable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that hee kept his footing in Thessa-¹⁰ lie, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore hee invited the Romans into the field; by waisting the land of the Phœræans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduventure euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terri-²⁰ fied; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done, for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Herby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The Towne of Sycurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient wa-³⁰ tering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not bee both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, hee found out a lodging, seven miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vnusual hour, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessarie, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedo-⁴⁰ nian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with little losse of his owne. But hee discouraged his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne campe. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their campe, and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnfit for: he neuertheless tooke it for found aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would ex-⁵⁰ alt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it bene greater, and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue bene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, when/oeuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would ad-⁶⁰ mine none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of their prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twenty horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the

the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remoue to a surer place beyond the Riuer Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to promise, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud termes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Aetolians were forely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein therest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especiall make, had been obserued to bee the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thebians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or giuen better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue rowed them whilst they were conueying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue bene done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prators, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him together vpon the spoyle of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the king set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoyle among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor found. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopisus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuertheless he was easily perswaded to vse the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yeeld vnto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had bene bound to the Romans; if the warre might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to graunt a truce, whilst Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approue the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Marius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none, save that Perseus would yeeld both his kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee so resolute in aduerlitle. On the other side, it argued a faint heart in Perseus, that hauing received an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the king withdrew himselfe backe to Sycyrium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the son of Misanisus, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betwene the king & them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest about which businesse they ranged all ouer the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe hee thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forrangers; he had a good hand vpon them, if hee could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilst he strooue to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul, by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misaduenture, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedonia, as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. Hee left all behinde him, saue onely Tempe, weakly guarded; and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus, hoping to haue taken it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perthebians and others; from whom he won some towines, & among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry towines thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thebians; vnlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Theffalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassadour could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece; and a Natie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebians, from whom the selfe dependants were taken by the Art of Marius, were more true to Rome, than other petty towines; which by that same distraction of the Boeotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had bene. The causes hereof were to haue bene fought among the changes, happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Eucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreme oppression hee could haue driuen them to farre. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in general; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and couetously demeaned himselfe.

Lic. lib. 4.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hofilius the Consul, and Horatius the Admirall, or Prator of the Fleet. Hofilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the war against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had sought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeede on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of 30 thousand, and who, by leuies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Vicena, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied forth vpon him, ouerthrow him; and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Vicena shortly after became Romane: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painfull iourney into Aetolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though hee were disappointed by those of the Romane faction; yet in his returne home, he tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleus, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian warre vnder Hofilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadours traueiling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches, tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by night and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achaean horse; but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue bene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but rather abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, & giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Aetolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approued the motion: as also among the

the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes, making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flattery; rating them openly, in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could beleene none ill, though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decreete the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbred among the Patriotes, which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to haue bene Traytors. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, & especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redresse of iniuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemen targets, and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the towne Rome, & appointed anniuersarie games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddess. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolomie, & the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the shamelesse flattery of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honours; when hee fees a towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddess; and received (without some of the giuers, or shame of the Present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

§ VII.

Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extreme difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Diium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassador to Martius from the Achaeans. Polybius his honest wisdom beneficiall to the Achaeans. King Eumenes grows auerse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he drawes into the Roman warre. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainely take vpon them to be arbiters betwene him and the Romans. Perseus loseth a mightie succour of the Bassarna, by his wretched parsimonie.

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had bene thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to become wise for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius & Hosilim the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon, and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by very many losses received. The Roman Admirals had so demeaned themselves, that many Townes, euen of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans side; and the Armie much lessened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one vpon another) in licencing the souldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hosilim, was to amend all this: which neuertheless was more than hee knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. Hee began hotly to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And hee began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely guarded, but taking pains to climbe the mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way hee meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to be discouered by the Enemy, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedient foot, to discover the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had sight of the Enemy, that lay to denie their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them: which hee did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arriual, but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely room vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to bee employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards; yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men hee left with 30 Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whilst hee, with the rest, fetched a compasse about, and sought out wayes that neuer had bene troden. Heerein hee found extreme difficultie: which notwithstanding hee overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such iourneys, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea, where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should bee. So steepe hee found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which hee tooke: that of seuen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vpriight, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a 40 terrible noyse, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grievous iourney; there was nothing more desired by the souldiours, than that they might bee suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But fluit was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe, the other sustained by two long postes, fastned in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or poles (which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should bee either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, betwene the higher and the lower fall: so as the 50 end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turfe; that they might seeme continent with the ground; so to make the beasts aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foote of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge bee shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of these; the posts vpholding the frame were cut asunder, thereby causing him to sink downe vnto the next bridge; whence hee was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the verie bottom. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how thoroughly provided the Romans

Romans vied to be in their iourneys; of things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable paines they took in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves, and all their carriages down the mountaines. The next day they rested, staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneys were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the needresse to their waies end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying fo night, that he might well nere haue heard the noyle. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, late hearkening after the event. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus, which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedonia. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seeke any other way, must bee faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the River Helecon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue beene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middle of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurs of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the very bankes of Peneus, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome iourney: if Perseus could haue seene his owne aduantages. For the Roman Armie was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauaile: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to return the same way that it came, if the King had made good the freight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants & carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemed a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from about their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedonia, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdom had often bene inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arrived, there was no meane to escape, without enforcing one of those passages, which they despaiied to winne. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemy was come ouer the mountaine into Tempe; than hee had like one out of his wittes; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haste; and straightway abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, hee sent a strait commandment to Theffalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soon after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the dammage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience; or Andronicus, for his carefull prouidence, merited the greater commendation; or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice, was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction; caused them both to beaine. Also those poore men, which had fercht his treasure out of the Sea by their diuing, were payed their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priuie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone securely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitee. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had topped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Aclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, where-to they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedonia. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedonia: wherein hauing travelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yielded, he was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne back towards Theffaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of needessite, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had bene carefull to occupy one of the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might come be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected, he forooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish iourney (if not worse than foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprife, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, hee should be faine to quite it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most bechoomed him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe, vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore meanes as haue been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which hee hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vied, would haue bene enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the river of Peneus, fure 40 miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumbleres. But it made such defence as it could, and was not giuen vp for feare. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Dium, as if he would haue taken it againe; and haue driuen the king further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea-Towns, Theffalonica, Callandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Theffalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worke. As for the Towne it selfe, there was danger in coming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the walls, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonea, (standing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiuing hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Callandrea. There king Eumenes ioined with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre; and fure other were sent thither from king Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Callandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were were arches in the town-wall filled vp with that earth, and couered with one single row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest: giuing an alarme to the other side of the towne, thereby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soone made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for ioy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; and fallying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch and the wall, of whom they slew about fixe hundred, and suffered few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. 10

Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not onely sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Meliboea; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelesly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agessipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclaea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeite. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him, not onely for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though 40
the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger; so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bene taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had bene driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craft-master, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neuer proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busie-headed mentake, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hestilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likly to invade Theffaly; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achæans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo propoised a decree which passed: That the Achæans should send their whole power into Theffaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadours vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure, Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the Armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclaea; where finding the time conuenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein foucer it should bee commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but said, That he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achæans, sixe thousand men, to beset him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if hee were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achæans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius, mauling and vnable to resolute whether it were for loue to the Achæans, that the Consul was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as hee was fure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this case therefore, hee had recourse vnto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was fure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achæans were saued, of more than an hundred and twentie Talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countreys behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeeres imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that king Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this king began when it was too late, to stand in feare lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerway all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certainty. One reports, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius: but coming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that hee refused to leaue behinde him certaine horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Atalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Atalus. But it is more generally receiued, that Eumenes gaue a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that couetousnesse drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoeuer it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a king and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vied the helpe of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Atalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, affailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith hee willed Eumenes to confider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, hee requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way; and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more neerely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should to giue answer; he began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, That if he might haue fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend vnto peace; and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages; but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes onely. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne; and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserued somewhat, howsoeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needs he would haue part of his wages in prest. Thus the two kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner delt Perseus with king Gentius the Illyrian. Hee had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten with in Tempe, then did his feare vrgel him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his Armie might haue comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gaue an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vain-glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should haue bene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such vfe of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embaddour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the young king, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed vp with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, vnder one Clondius a petty king, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarna. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to giue the souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondius) tell thy master; That the Gauls will not stirre one foote further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an inuocative against the inciuillitie and avarice of the Bastarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fiftethousand horse of them, hee said would bee as many as hee should need to vse; and not so many, that hee should need to feare them. It had bene well done, if any of his countailours would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, since without any danger to the kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perthabia, into Thessaly: where wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoyle, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the king notable seruice, whether they wonne any victory, or not. This, and a great 10 deale more, might haue bene alledged, if any man had dared to giue aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thousands that had bene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondius asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those five thousand, whom the king would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifiting excuses; the Bastarna returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than hee could haue well expected.

30 Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preferre his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painful Office he was very soone discharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fiftene daies after his setting forth from Italy, brought the kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a king so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmylius Paulus the Consul, His journey. Hee forceth Perseus to dis campe. Hee will not hazard battaile with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moone. Æmylius his superstition. The battaile of Pydna. Perseus his flight. Hee forsakes his Kingdome: which hastily yeelds to Æmylius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yeelds himselfe to the Roman Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Æmylius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so moued them, that either * they decreed that Prouince to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betwene him and his fellow Consul, or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee 50 refused to propound vnto the Senate any thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by his Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowne to be such, as hath bene already told; the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Nauie, and likewise to the Armie that lay betwene Illyria and Epyrus: from which App. Claudius was remo-ued, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that did thinke themselves wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by hearesay, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainly: That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amylius, who died valiantly in the Battaille of Cannæ, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney, with an especiall hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more than could haue beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set saile at break of day, and arrived safely at the Ille of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollon, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium, hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, & much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne miles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shore and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amylius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not aboue the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclæa, on the riuer of Peneus; where hee had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward being defended as hath beene already shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympos, leading into Perræbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius either had not bene informed hereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduenture; they fearing lest it would prouee such a peece of worke as had beene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiers among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about five thousand men to this enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Amylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleet; where victuals were provided for their iourney: it being noised, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay

well were all drie, yet hee feared not for that: that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Waggoners employed amongst his Yalikes; of whom the Kings light armature had great charge at first distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. These lightes from off the Tower which Perseus had rayled on his owne bankes, did allysse vpon the Romans, and gaue them to understand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amylius persisted as hee had begunne; and continued his assault, such as it could be the second day. This might haue serued to reach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: a force of thirty a good Capitaine, as Amylius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such battailes; that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running itarefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following and seacheking; This was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge: or rather without of set, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so; that they, which had custodie of the pillage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good success in their iourney. It may well be, that they slepe vntill the Romans came, somewhat neerer to them; and then taking alarme; when their arrows and dings could doe little seruice, were beaten at handy-strokes; so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polibius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue bene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon; which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunitie.

Perseus was in an extreame doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing bene taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence; But faire worke counsaile preyailed; as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazzard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are iealous) not ouer-carefully reliqued. This was euen the same that Amylius, or any invader, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neere vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There hee abode the coming of the enemy; who stayed not long behinde him. As soone as the Romans had light of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had hasted away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well-fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting lest otherwise the king should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Amylius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereunto, at good leysure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall to blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the king, hee excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere bene Praetor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to bee the same night: willing the souldiers not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beate Pannes of Brasse and Bisons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone

great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse: since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in ciuill affaires, & matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obseruation it is, how superstition capriuates the vnderstanding of the wisest, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Amilius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor above the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any deuout regard thereof: yet could he not reframe from doing his duty to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliuerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish deuotion; yet it is like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules, which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vouchsafed to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Amilius: but with condition, That hee should not giue the onset. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda, or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Amilius was thoroughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retire whether hee listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would bee much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the riuier, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His Countreimen seeing this, hasted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the riuier. Heerevpon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordingly as the manner of his Countrey, and the Armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, saue that on the sides a few hillockes were raised heere and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaille, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose vnseasonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocritic. For hee that will pray for a good good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaille, he found it no better than lost: and hee, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amilius was therat much astonished; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine, and the Squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduerso to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue bene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaille, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost the impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worse) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction giuen by Amilius, when he saw the front of the Enemies great battaille become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx pronounced vnauailable against many small Squadrons, as it had bene formerly in the battaille of Cynoscephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnerserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not eury where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little such inconuenience of ground, as had bene at * Cynoscephale. ^{chap. 4. §. 14.}

Perseus, when hee saw his battaille begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne againe towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner vnouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew about twenty thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaille, onely some fourescore, or six score men at the most. Some of the foote, escaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: eury one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their king, the number began within a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that dayes misfortune; which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella; he found his Pages and household seruants, ready to attend him, as they had bene wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaille, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnseasonable admonitions, hee stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief: hee stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Euan- dar (who had bene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians; more for loue of his money than of him. To these he gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly hee coozened them of some part thereof, making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaille hee came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Townes-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euan- dar to speake what himselfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves.

Vpon

Vpon the first raine of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth vnder colour of a gainefull employment, & shutting the gates after them. And now to be ridde of the king, they plainly bade Eumenes to be gone. The king hearing this, had no minde to tarry; but embarking himselfe and the treasure which he had there, in certaine vessels that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where hee hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the king make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amyntus, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neereft at hand, was the last that yielded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantaneus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves and the Towne of Beræa, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the king had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman Armie. Amyntus sent abroad into the Countrey, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same wherof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. Hee sent these letters by person of such meane condition; that his case was pitied, for that he wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire fauour: which though he begged in termes ill becoming a king, yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless, in this conference, hee was marvellous earnest, that hee might bee allowed still to retaine the name of king. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his Treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and to bee called King. Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his kingdome of Macedon, for * such a paltrie Iland; and for that he offered to lay vpon the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessity, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavianus the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the king out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, hee had now alreadye imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like priuiledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of king Eumenes at Delphi: This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the king, That Eumenes, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, wherof vntill he can cleere himselfe in iudgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Maiestic, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auale, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author: Perseus therefore willed Eumenes to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be presidents and ouerscers of this iudgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Eumenes seemed to like well: and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deserting the place as it were to get payson, wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of neede, makes all the Kings friends that remained liue, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Eumenes therein. Or if the Romans will ascribe too much, who shall dare to gainesay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that all so lyable to dispute, which prefers him from captiuitie, he purposeth to make an escape, and bye, with his Treasures, vnto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Orestes a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship, who easily was persuaded to waite the Kings theefe. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboard by night; and the king himselfe, with his wife and children, if rather it were not true, that he had with him onely Philis his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and quet a muddy wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Orestes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoare; who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ranne therefore againe towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter in the common way, lest he should be taken; he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire, till Orestes made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoeuer, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally. That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ena, a Thessalian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Orestes. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, securing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleate. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of resigning therein, he might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery; and one among the number of those Princes, that haue beene wretched by their owne default. He was presently sent away to Caesar, before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abied qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Amyntus vied to him the language of a gentle Victor, blaming him, though mildly, for hauing with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answer might haue beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul teard me it) almost assurance, for that such was the mercie of the people of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, & respectfully entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Calpurnius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after foure yeeres continuance: & such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory wherof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now transfused vnto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celeritie, Antius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand, with which he was at first ready to assault King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereto he had received onely ten talents. But Antius arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and draue him into Scodra. This Towne was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification, & strongly manned with all the force of Illyria, which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme impossible to be wonne, in any reasonable long time. Yet Antius was confident in his late victory, and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselves within the Towne, would needes istie forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors, by whom, at first, he desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to haue recourse to such meditation. But he thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison; where they were still alive. Having obtained three dayes respite, he passed vp a Riuer within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately, though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Cirtuantus was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent Messengers craving access vnto the Prætor, before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so greuous as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yielded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdom, together with his wife, children, brother, friends were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun vntill Perseus, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Antius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaued themselves in Greece and Macedonia after their victory over Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune, and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had beene vanquished: toward them before, whilst the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were full of shame, when the tidings of his late victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe, this they performed with a bad grace, saying that they were sent from Rhodes to make an offer of peace, forasmuch as it was thought that this Warre was no lesse grieuous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others; but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended with more happily than had bene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue of Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonians, whose partizans they were, and should be taken by these byways, and the desire of faine (conceit of the charge) to haue Wars, and more against Rhodes, the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie, beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had bene

any whit auerse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace, and lesse would haue done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vntured a milde sentence, and aduertised the Senate, That in decreeing warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedy to ranke, than any iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any marke remained aliue, save those that had bene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Amylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power he had ouer them. More than five hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrias were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redresse was such, as required not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he fasted like a king, with excessive cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome, some, to giue order for selling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsual in such cases, and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Amylius and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order thereto from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had bene payed vnto the kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest, the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captiue into Italy, with their wiues and children, as many as were about fifteene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Amylius. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any inconuenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea, and shamelesse periury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way discomfited an vnseruicable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome, where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: & in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traitors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing bene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the king: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deale more formally: so much because that Common wealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntenable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspiciously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callistates, nor any of his adherents, had bene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achæans with the rest.

And

And hereto Callistrates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischeuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callistrates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, hee would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, wee will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prators, as many as had led their armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise haue bene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited about a thousand; willing them to appeare and answer before the Senate. This might euen be termed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their ioue vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, to that vertue, & regard of the publike liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should retorne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achæans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after fouenteene yeeres, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polylus, the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made stike to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome; or whether out of layle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preferue the Macedonian Treasure whole, yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be wipall to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amylius with mischeuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; hee sent vnto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne wherein he was sent. Thus in one day were thre score and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had bene already sent into Italie, thereto receiue their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that God was pleased to make Amylius childlesse, euen in the glory of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwile his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The Warre of Antiochus vpon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

Antiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reigne and life. Hee died the sixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worn a Crowne, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolomie Epiphane: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iustine) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopater, Antiochus Epiphane, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolomie Epiphane, king of Egypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes, reigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Salustius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was sloathfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had receiued, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this iudgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall rise up a wilde person, unworthy the honour of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, & other to the same effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliadorus sent by the king to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphane. It is therefore from the reigne of this king, that the books of the Maccabees take beginning. Which books seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphane, the brother and successeur of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the hundred thre score and seuenteenth yeere of the Greeks in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proame, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian reigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembering in the fourth Chapter the practice of Isaion the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphane, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius king of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Iews, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successeur of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome, repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereof Iosephus adds, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassadour was Demoteles; and that the Letters had a square Volume, & were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clowes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphane, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolomie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had bene about seuen yeeres King of Egypt.

Ptolomie Epiphane, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his kingdome between them, whilst he was a child. But they found such other businesse, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose, especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolomie, the Prouinces of Coelosyria, Phoenice, & Iudæa, which he had won by his victory ouer Scopar, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolomie adhered to the Romans: whereby he liued in the greater securitie. He left behinde him two sonnes, this Ptolomie Philometor, and Ptolomie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nick-name, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, & was like to be chafed out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vnckle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vp-on him the protection of the yong Prince, sought by all means possible to possesse himselfe of that kingdome. He sent Apollonius, the sonne of Antisthenes Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouvernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the king his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongst the coast of Syria to Ioppe, & from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) he was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouvernour of Coelosyria and Phoenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen: the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threescore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iason, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kind, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achæans, when as that mischieuous Callicrates, who had bene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more fore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes, more swift does fly.
So one most mischieuous of men before,
Callicrates, false knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.*

And euen thus fell it out with Iason: who within three yeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iason thereupon being forced to flye from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phoenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty army of land forces, He went about to raigue ouer Egypt, that hee might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Naue, and moued warre against Ptolemæus King of Egypt: but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death.

He won many strong Cities, and tooke away the spoiles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was filled Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Prouinces, and hee shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolomie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Cassius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went vp towards Israel and Ierusalem with a multitude of people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the lights, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Pouring vessels, and the Bibles, and the golden Basins, and the Vase, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Coelosyria, iustifying his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffly assering, that this Prouince had not bene consigned ouer to the Egyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their king his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolomies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwile not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard peece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine war, than by the terror of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leauing the Ptolomies in very weake estate, the yonger almost ruinated by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weake soeuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the kings, called Antiochis. For Gouvernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an In-comme, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Stratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacriledge of Menelaus, he repressed him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compass it had abouten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweete Springs, banqueting places, and the like, which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust & other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo & Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I lay for mine owne opinion, that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearfull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore olde man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when he came to Onias, hee counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; so hee slew him inconsciously without any regard of righteousness. Hereof

when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia. He took away Antiochus his garment of purple, and renobled clothes, and commanded him to be taken out of the Citie, and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Antias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked king had once in his life-time done iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolomee, a Traytor to Ptolomee Philometor, hee condemned innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Antiochus, and his brother Antiochus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold, remaining. Merely it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of iustice: since he reuenged the death of Antias, yet slew those that were in the same cause with Antias; who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should have bene heard as innocents. By reason of such his wickednesse, this king was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and thenvera there some throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, for manye long, heresmany running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troopes of horsemen set in array, encountering, and couing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather fore-warnings of God, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a star in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the City, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tells vs, that Armies were seen fighting in the ayre from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine powred out blood in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipers hath collected many, and very remembreable. But this one seemeth to mee most memorabile, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well natural as adopted,ooke end; whereof this notable signe gaue warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire encrease of white Poultry; and from the little Branch there sprang vp in time a Grove of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vieto carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; & after the Triumphs ended, so set it againe in the same ground: which branches were offered, when they happened to wither, to foretew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be unworthy of regard, it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was mentioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomee being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle, thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreame) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his armie; yet had hee left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishing of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Coelosyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolomee. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolomee should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territorie thereto belonging; and that he should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that hee had vnto either of them, for euer. For answer vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolomee in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie iournies.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iuster cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it should be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Nevertheless, the Egyptian kings being reconciled, and standing ioyntly in need of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefites, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal, when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolomies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requittall: but with continuance of suitable beneficence, from time to time increased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde, especially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadours lay still in Rome. Of the Achæans they desired in particular, that Lycortus the braue warrior might bee sent vnto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hercunto the Achæans readily consented: and would immediately haue made performance, if Callistates had not interposed his mischieuous art. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, bee ayding vnto the Ptolomies. For it was not now (hee said) conuenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans, what helpe fouer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius

the two Confull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foot, and two hundred horse, might well be spared; to the ayde of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could without trouble, raise thirre or foure thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was defetred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Calpurnius. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed, he brought into the Theatre where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadours to set Egypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeede sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durst not gaine say the Roman Council; which had force of an iniunction. So the kings were left in much disrepute, disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadour sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadours of Phrygia and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more than a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadours deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philonetor, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

Polyb. lib. 7.

In this ambassage of Ptolemy, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or foure yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eumenes, or Lenaus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layed) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely he determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Celestria; but would haue interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these ligh thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subiects, he might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, he had remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed it selfe, euen in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beardes overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, groning and prostrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their looks and Countenances so sadde and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pittifull and grievous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederat; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Armie out of Egypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vsed any delay; then should Ptolemy and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof; in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimus, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptolemy; and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surrendred, and gaue over Armies, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obdurate, or vsing delay. So these Romans together with the Alexandrian Embassadours, took their leaue, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

While Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. Sometime he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper; willing him to read those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius; That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Comandement, after hee had stayed and pawed a while, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such vnusurps. * Daniel had prophesied long before; yea; fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischiefe to Jerusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene historified than foretold by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed awhile, and settled the kingdome of Egypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the yonger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an overthrow to the Egyptian ships.

S. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Rhodus, Macedonia, and Corys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius, with the Conclusion of the warre.

By this peremptoric demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Acheans and Asiatians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farr lesse power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much less vsed any menacing teatines, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Galls, which mistreated him. Very welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senators; who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his blisset Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approued, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soone reuelmed by the faithfull counsaile of Strabo, a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent; recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, where withall hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could; and finally requested, That the Townes of Achaia and Asiatica might be bestowed vpon himselfe. *By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not onely granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue vnto him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuerthelesse, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst hee was yet in Italy, they gaue order for the liberty of Annus and Maronia; thereby making vncleall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallo-greeces, which were about to invade the kingdome of Perga.¹⁰ mus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might wel blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neither could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no king should²⁰ be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias king of Bithynia had bene at Rome somewhat before, where hee was welcomed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entering into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, called the Fathers his gods and fauours: as also hee vied to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slaue, and one that by such abiect flattery kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had bene charged. His errand was, besides matter of comple-³⁰ ment, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whom hee brought with him to Rome, thereto receiue education. Further petition hee made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the grant would haue bene vniust, hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardshippe of his sonne, it was vnderaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboute all other Kings, Masaniissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to⁴⁰ him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue iudgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to de-uise vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniissa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for ioy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol.⁵⁰ his good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at home.

Cato the Thrasian sent Embassadors, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him, giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages, and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie, for conuenient ranfome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giuing hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ranfome-free; with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward

Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betwene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappy kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emilius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suite to Emilius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one scornfull answer, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than he found, hee would rather haue fought his death in Macedon, than haue bin beholding to the clemencie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie, 10 whereof Emilius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow king, had bene led in chaires through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, he should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honor of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were overcome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus: yet so, that he had little ioy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is vncertaine 20 how. The yongest called Alexander (only in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In such poutie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eight-score yeeres after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had known it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie worke, in a painfull Occupation; it is like, that he would not as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignete, haue commanded those poore men to be slaine, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. Hee 30 would rather haue bene very gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppression, and the most vnderroden wretches, are all subiect vnto the One High Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command. But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Do as ye would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will bee like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

40 All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can iudge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few; among whom also, very few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other neerensse in blood, be driuen to slatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vn-50 worthy of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vntimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Heereunto may be added, That the heyre of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparant to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same vpon the Line of subject gas they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorio Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the quill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so do they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happy that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That God is the fittest and sharpest Schoolemaster that can be desired, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without any regard to turne it upside-downe as their pleasure.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintus Flaminius; though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thence forth, vntill the ciuill Wars which followed vpon the death of Iulius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindered by the soldiers; who grudged at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Soldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fise daies before the Triumph; the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne private calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Othanius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicim the Pretor, who had conquered Myria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enow to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiām, Take upon thee the Maiestie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which we haue already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. Thus of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field, hauing roored vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, & conquering Nations, haue bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragickall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue bene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and bloweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrius proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often bene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge, which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stollen out of the world without noyse, than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world; by rapine, oppression, and crueltie; by giuing in spoye to the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent; and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sort of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath bene no State fearefull in the East, but that of

of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, & by the many kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoysed by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue bene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensue Warre, and in diuersions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand continued but for two yeeres, or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to liue in peace, but all their swelling and ouer-flowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels & old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, & to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof; the one to ioyne all Europe to Asia, the other therest of all Europe to Spaine.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bene already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwaies transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enioy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleueed; God, which hath made him, and loues him, is alwaies deferred. I haue considered, (saith Salomon) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of spirit: but who beleues it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enioyne his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that iustice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaining, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust, and mighty Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out, besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspokeable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught me to say with Iob, Versa est in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the Reader

The use of Chronologically, and the necessity of it, is not to be denied, but to any length of time; and that of all, to the present time, is most necessary. Since the world, like a river, is ever flowing, and the events of it are not coherent, this here following, may serve to the purpose. Part of the world, which is the present time, is the present time, and the events of it are not coherent. Part of the world, which is the present time, is the present time, and the events of it are not coherent.

into the world, and the events of it are not coherent. Part of the world, which is the present time, is the present time, and the events of it are not coherent. Part of the world, which is the present time, is the present time, and the events of it are not coherent.

The Titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them; as will readily be conceived, where two Titles or more, are over the head, as ^{above} there are the numbers underneath, answer proportionally, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Ichosaphat began his reign in the 3774. of the Julian Aera, in the 3092. of the world, and in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much so those that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forborne to insert those yeeres, which I finde not joined with some remarkable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reigne; some change of Government; some Battaille fought; or the like. So, of the 3. yeeres wherein Syllius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the first, that is, omitting all between the 4. of Ichosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Syllius Auentinus succeeded, and wherein Ichoram first reigned with Ichosaphat his father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a page with 12. lines of syllabers, numbering forth 2, 3, 4, 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Auentinus, and the 17. of Ichosaphat. In setting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fifteenth, or so forth, in rank; of else that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeere of his reigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space quies leane) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned, in the spaces following under which these yeeres of his which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there it is to be understood, that the same yeere belonged, not only to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more, of his fore-gone: as the first yeere of Ichoram King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So, where two or three names are found in one space; as in the 3077. yeere of the world, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri: it is meant that every one of them reigned in some part of the same yeere, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the yeeres of the Egyptian Kings, are set down the yeeres of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwise, the day, the month upon which Nabonassars yeere began; which, have it varied from other yeeres, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Aera, or account of yeeres from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the Book itself: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads is set down first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeere of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeere thereof.

Now, for that the yeeres of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columns; opposing part of the one yeere to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more trouble (some than usefull); since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be wistome in it. It will surely be usefull to observe, that howsoever the Acta of the Olympiads be 24. yeeres elder than that of Rome, and 29. thim that of Nabonassar, yet the reigns of some kings may begin at such a time of the year as doth not fall with such difference. But hereselfe I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example may explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17. of November, in the yeere of our Lord, 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, braks it up, and downe Images, and reformed many things in Religion: all in half feere yett; not all in that yeere 1558. but the greater part in the yeere following; whether we begin with the feast of Lamsmas, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwise found in this Table; but so, as the difference is never of a whole yeere.

The Tulian Period, which happened in the greater number, over the years of the World, was delivered by that honorable and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Tulian years, now in use among us. It consists of 7980. years, which result from the multiplication of 29.28. and 271. that is: if the Cycle of the Moons, the Cycle of the Sun, and the yeeres of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present year; or if no division remaine it shewes the last yeere of that Cycle to kee current. For example in the 4498. of the present year, when we sought the great heatare of Canaan, the Prime or Golden number was 24. the Cycle of the Sun 18. and consequently the Dominical letter F may be found by dividing the same number of the Tulian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Tulian Period, after the present account, above exceeds the yeeres of the world by 681. Besides the former title, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeere, then any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more obscure position.

where I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explanation of these Tables. Neither was there much requisite to such as are commoners in works of this kind: is sufficient if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.

THE CONTENTS OF THE CHAP- TERS, PARAGRAPHS, AND SE- ctions, of the First Booke of the First Part, of the Historie of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation and Preservation of the WORLD.

§. I.
That the invisible God is seene in his Creatures.

§. II.
That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue bene created by God

§. III.
Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. I. I.

§. IIII.
Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth,] Gen. I. I.

§. V.
That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Inform'd and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI.
How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.
Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sonne; and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

§. VIII.
Of the Firmament, and of the Waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.
That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.
Of Fate, and that the Stars haue great influence; and that their operation may diuersly be prevented or furthered,

§. XII.
Of Prescience.

§. XIII.
Of Providence.

§. XIIIII.
Of Predestination.

§. XV.
Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, & against Reason and Providencie.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

S. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

S. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

S. III.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof, should yeelde to the immortall soule.

S. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

S. V.

with a digression touching our mortality.*

S. VI.

first Creation to dispose of himselfe.*

S. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

S. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly misla-ken, and that it is no maruell that men should erre.

S. II.

A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

S. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

S. IIII.

gently of the place of Paradise.*

S. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

S. VI.

*That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some base thought, making the Ocean to bee
the Fountaine of those foure Rivers.*

S. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the ayre.

S. VIII.

tion under those Climates.*

S. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelestia, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

S. X.

Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.*

S. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one fream.

S. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soyle, which is certaine that Eden was such.

S. XIII.

*Of the river Gehon, & the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Aethiopia for

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

S. I.

That the Tree of Life was a materiall tree:
and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, was made subiect to death.

S. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

S. III.

of the story of his Ficus Indica.*

S. IIII.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sinne.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of diuerse Memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

S. I.

Of the cause and euenge of Cains sinne:
and of his going out from God.

S. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

S. III.

cerning Cains generation.*

S. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Age of the Patri-archs, when they begate their children.

S. V.

*Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and

S. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

S. VII.

Of the men of warre before the Flood.

S. VIII.

That the Gyants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

ing, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Relicks of Truth touching these ancient times, obscure-ly appearing in Fables and old Legends.*

S. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

S. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

S. III.

That in proceesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse supersitions of the Egyptians.

S. IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first

dolls & Fables were invented: & that the first Iupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain &c.

S. V.

Of the three chiefe Iupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

Of Noahs Flood.

S. I.

Of Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

S. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

S. III.

Of Deucalions flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Vmbria in Italy a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

S. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the vni-uersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

S. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene fore-scene by the starres.

S. VI.

*That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Flood:
and what are Cataclysæ Coeli, Gen. 7. 11.*

S. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

S. VIII.

*Of sundry particulars touching the Arke:
as the place where it was made: the matter, fashion, and name.*

S. IX.

S. X.

Taurus*

The Contents

Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.

A proposal of all the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion: They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.

The second Argument, That the Eastern people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

†. V.

The third Argument; From the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.

Of the senseless Opinion of Annius, the Commenter upon Berolus, That the Arke rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; & yet upon Gordiazi, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.

The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow Naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

An answer to the Obiection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia; and the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills than the Armenian.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Story wee should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia vnto the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvaile, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and euen in India, be called Ararat.

†. XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaine Caucasus, and toward the East Indies, and of other excellencies of the soyle.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

S. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Iaphet.

S. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

S. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Iaphets portion: of Berolus his too freely seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal, in Spaine: and also of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

S. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mefech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezech. Chap. 38. 39.

S. V.

Against the fabulous Berolus his Fiction, That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

S. VI.

That Gomer also, and his Son Togormaz, of the Posteritie of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread westward into Europe; & Northward into Sarmatia.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet, and of Mefech, of Aram, & Mefech of Iaphet.

S. VIII.

Of Ascanes and Riphath, the two Elder sonnes of Gomer.

S. IX.

Of the four sons of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

S. X.

Of the second Booke.

S. X.

That the lesse of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia; and of strange Tales; & Interpretations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

OF Iosephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse, wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the fate of Chush.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

†. III.

Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia. Ezechiel 29. 10.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senatherib, and Zera in the Story of Ala, are vnadvisedly made Ethiopians.

†. VII.

A farther explication of the place, Esay 13. 1.

S. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunatic yeeres, which made their Antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius, That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation: at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Genes. 10. vlt. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with some short of Phut, another son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

S. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

OF the boundes of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Heuites, & Harkites.

†. V.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

S. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.

That the most of the sons of Chush, were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Tob: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

†. II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the west Ethiopia, disprooued out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, chap. 9. v. 7.

S. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.

OF Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his sonnes.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, &c.

†. IIII.

Of the sons of Ioctan, the other son of Heber.

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Ioctans sons, and of Pererius, and of that voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan; with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the world.

CHAP.

The Contents

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: & of the degrees of humane Societies.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first kings.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Saurai: one Lord, and that his beginning seemeth to have bene of iust authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Vr of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.

That wee are not to meruaile how so many kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affixe vnto it.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and lastly, of his warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magic: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned; though the Devil here, as in other kindes, hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

§. V.

The abuse of things, which may bee found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of unlawfull Magicke.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Devil seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead, by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage, and education: and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

§. IIII.

Of the second Booke.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfure: with a note of the improbabilitie of her victories.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a brife transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.

The answer to one of the Obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the Obiections proposed, shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two brethren should bee respected.

§. V.

The answer to yet more of the Obiections, shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two brethren should bee respected.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons, prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue bin king, lyes betwene Coelefytia, and Arabia Petraea.

§. XI.

That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.

That it is not improbable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies: planted themselves, and so retayned the names of the countries whence they came: which if it bee so, wee need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

A Briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulties in resolving of the truth in these points.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, & otherwise, it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oft-times many under one King.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

Of the time when Osiris reigned ended; and that Iacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Osiris.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptus, Orus and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostris.
